

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

IN THE

SECOND SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 5 AUGUST, 1886, IN THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

SIXTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1887.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 16th May, 1887.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Jubilee
Service in Westminster Abbey, appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS — First Reading — Metropolis Management (Battersea and Westminster) *
(101).

Second Reading — Quarries (83); Police Force
Enfranchisement (77).

Committee — Irish Land Law (58).

QUARRIES BILL.—(No. 83.)

(The Lord Sudeley.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD SUDELEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he wished to explain that the object of the

VOL. CCCXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Bill was merely to oblige quarries dangerous to the public in open and unprotected land, or within 50 yards of a highway or public resort, to be securely fenced for the prevention of accidents. He wished further to say that county Coroners had constantly reported a number of fatal accidents arising from this cause, and also that the Bill had passed through the House of Commons.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Sudeley.)

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he rose to oppose the Motion, on account of the looseness of the definitions of a quarry, as an opening in the ground from which stone had been taken. In Wales, where there were walls and no hedges, every farm had a small quarry. The definitions went on to include sand holes and gravel pits, which were not dangerous, and mentioned openings from which clay had been taken—that is to say, ponds. In Cheshire, and parts of the adjoining counties, almost every field had a marl pit, if not two or three of them. These ponds required to be kept open for cattle. Even if they were railed in, that would not keep out children; neither would poles, which, being constantly stolen, so as to leave gaps, be any protection to children, who would get through or under any fence.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a.

POLICE FORCE ENFRANCHISEMENT

BILL.—(No. 77.)

(The Earl of Harrowby.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he believed that the measure would meet with the acceptance of their Lordships. He trusted their Lordships would give it a favourable consideration on the ground that it was one of the very comparatively small company of Bills which had as yet reached them from "another place" that Session. Including Provisional Orders only 21 Bills had yet come up from the other House to their Lordships; whereas, he understood that their Lordships had forwarded 54 to the other House. The present Bill had had the support of three Secretaries of State, and upon its own merits also, it well deserved a second reading. Soldiers, sailors, Revenue officers, and postmen, all now had the right to exercise the franchise, and it was only fair and just that that right should be extended to the Police Force. He, therefore, hoped their Lordships would give the Bill a second reading. The police, as a rule, were respected by all but the evildoers. There was no body of men in this country who were more law-loving and more worthy of the great trust of the franchise, and there was reason to believe that they felt deeply the fact of their being deprived of it. He would conclude by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Harrowby.)

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, he did not rise to oppose the Bill; but he confessed that he thought it required a very great deal of consideration. The nature of the duties of the police were such as to make it a serious question whether it was consistent with those duties whether they should be admitted to the franchise. He admitted that, as a body, the police would bear a not unfavourable comparison with other classes who now possessed the franchise; but supposing that, at a contested election, there was a disturbance in which the police were called upon to act for the restoration of order, surely, it would be better that that duty should be performed by a body of men taking no part in the election, and quite independent of either Party, than by a body of men who took part in the contest, and were interested on one side or the other. He called attention to the position of soldiers in the Army as being a case analogous to that of the police.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he wished to point out that the Royal Irish Constabulary were not included in the Bill, although every word which had been said in praise of the Police of Great Britain could be said with greater force in favour of the Royal Irish Constabulary, to whom not only the Government, but every respectable man, woman, and child in Ireland, owed a deep debt of gratitude. He was sure that by their omission from the provisions of that Bill, there was no intention of casting a slur on that excellent body of men; but he trusted that they would hear from the Government that it was their intention, at the earliest opportunity, to introduce a Bill dealing separately with the Royal Irish Constabulary and putting them on an equal footing with their brethren in England and Scotland.

LORD BRABOURNE gave a warm support to the Bill, but said, that he only rose in consequence of the remark of his noble and learned Friend (the Earl of Selborne) with regard to soldiers. With great submission to the noble Earl, he would remind him that recent decisions in the Registration Courts had established the right of soldiers to vote at Parliamentary Elections, if duly qualified. What this Bill proposed to do was, not to give votes to men because they were policemen, but to enact that, if otherwise duly qualified, they should not be disfranchised on account of their being policemen.

Lord Stanley of Alderley

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, he wished to explain that his remarks were not applied to policemen generally, but only to those who might be on duty during elections.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

INDIA—THE LAND ACQUISITION ACT —EXPROPRIATION OF ZEMINDARS AT ARNI GHAT, MUSSOORIE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to present a Petition; and to ask the Secretary of State for India, If it was true that at Mussoorie there were three men in possession of a cultivatory holding of 200 bighas, at a fixed rent of Rs. 5 to Rs. 8 a-year, and of very considerable value. The land was taken away by Government under the Land Acquisition Act, and Mr. Laidman assessed the compensation to be given. In the result he awarded Rs.3,300 to the person entitled to receive the rent, and Rs. 2,400 to the tenants, and out of this Rs. 2,400 he gave all but Rs. 900 to the creditor of one of the tenants, so that the three, who were formerly in a position of comparative opulence, were turned out upon the world as beggars; and, if it is true, whether he will direct that these men be compensated; also, if he will inquire whether Mr. Laidman's Court was one duly qualified under the Land Acquisition Act for hearing the case; and whether the public notices and proclamations required by the Act had been made; also to ask the Secretary of State if he will inquire into the conduct of the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Provinces, Sir Alfred Lyall—(1) in respect to the Arni Ghat expropriation; (2) his ordering Mr. Laidman to prosecute Captain Hearsey; (3) his promotion of Mr. Laidman after the trial; (4) the secret Circular to his judicial subordinates commenting adversely on the judgment of the Chief Justice? said, according to the Notice, he had the honour to present a Petition from Captain Hearsey, asking for redress on account of the acts of the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Provinces. Captain Hearsey's family had been attainted in 1745 on account of the presence of some of them at the Battle of Culloden. Since then they had settled in India, and 10 of his relatives had served in the Indian Army. His father was General Sir J. B. Hearsey, who played a considerable part in the Mutiny. The case which he had to lay before the House consisted of two separate complaints—first, with regard to the spoliation of the Arni Ghat Zemindars for the purpose of providing a better botanical garden for Mussoorie; and, secondly, with respect to the conduct of Sir Alfred Lyall, as it arose out of the spoliation of these Zemindars. The noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cross) would not be able to deny the description of the injury suffered by these Zemindars given in the Notice Paper, because these words were taken from the summing up of the Chief Justice in a trial arising out of the first wrong done to the Zemindars. This Chief Justice was then the Chief Justice at Allahabad, and he had since become the Chief Justice of Calcutta. The wrong done to the three brothers who owned Arni Ghat was that they were forcibly deprived, under the Land Acquisition Act, of land and houses valued at Rs.22,000 for a nominal sum of Rs.5,700. That this sum was entirely inadequate was clear from the fact that the three assessors of all the parties agreed in stating that this property, which was irrigated, could produce 400 maunds of wheat per annum besides other crops. At the price for wheat in the locality, at 20 years' purchase—the basis laid down in the Land Acquisition Act—this gave Rs.20,000 and Rs.2,000 for the houses on it. Another proof consisted in the fact that the old discarded botanical garden had since been sold for Rs.10,000; yet it must have been inferior to Arni Ghat, or it would not have been abandoned for Arni Ghat. There was yet a further injustice done to these unfortunate Zemindars. A certain mohunt or priest had a chief rent of Rs.5 on Arni Ghat, the payment of which should have been continued by the Government on behalf of the botanical gardens, as would have happened in the case of a Scotch feu or an English chief rent; or the chief rent might have been extinguished at 25 years' purchase, which would have been Rs.125; but, instead of that, Mr. Laidman, the Judge of the Small Causes Court which settled this case, assigned Rs.3,300, or the larger half of the purchase money—Rs.5,700—to the mohunt or owner of the chief rent of Rs.5. He must explain an apparent discrepancy between Rs.5 and the Rs.5 to Rs.8 a-year mentioned by the Chief Justice. By the deed—of which he had in his hand a translation—

"The high priest and ruler and chief mohunt of the Gurn Guddee, by name Saroop Dass, gave a grant by deed of the village of Arni Ghat to Dilloo, for which the ruler of the Gurn Guddee shall receive year by year the sum of Government rupees five only. If any Zemindar shall disturb or annoy Dilloo (in his possession) the ruler (of the Gurn Guddee) shall fine that individual: all other claims (with the exception of the five rupees) are given absolutely and free by the ruler of the Gurn Guddee."

The other Rs.3 referred to by the Chief Justice as occasionally given were a "nuzzur," or voluntary offering to the priest. The motive alleged for this gratuitous injustice was that this mohunt was in the habit of lending elephants, carriages, and other conveniences to Indian officials. Of the remaining sum of Rs.2,400, the Judge assigned the greater part to the creditors of one of the three brothers or owners, and he also ordered Rs.234 to be deducted for Government costs, though it was said that this was contrary to the Land Acquisition Act, and some Rs. 900 was all that was left for the owners. It might be asked why the three dispossessed Zemindars did not avail themselves of their right of appeal? It was the extreme poverty to which they were reduced which deprived them of this resource. They had not the means to fee counsel to place their case before the High Court. Captain Hearsey's letter says of the eviction, after the decree of Mr. Laidman—

"In the beginning of November, 1882—the men had refused, at my advice, to quit their houses and homes—the superintendent of the Dhoon sent for all the males of the village to his office, which was in Mussoorie, about four miles off, and, as in duty bound, they attended. It was a cold winter day, alternate heavy showers of sleet and rain deluged and froze the earth, the wind cut like a razor. During the absence of the men, at the order of the local authorities, certain Mahomedan coolies, Awghanias, broke open their doors, thrust the women and children out into the cold winter blast, and pitched their clothes, bedding, cooking utensils, and stores of food after them into the rain and sleet. When the men returned late in the afternoon from the superintendent's office, they found their women and children waiting in the open in the soaking rain for their arrival, their winter store of food damaged by rain, and they and their wives and little ones homeless and shelterless. I believe for that night they took shelter in the Barlow-gunj bazaar—a small bazaar belonging to a member of our family. This is the action of the myrmidons of the State landlord, the Government of India."

This description might possibly remind their Lordships of the Glenbeigh evictions; but there was this difference—the person who caused those evictions was owed five years' rent, and would have taken half-a-year's rent, so that he was evicting for a 10th part of what was his own; but the Government of the North-West Provinces had evicted for what was not their own, and for which they had not paid a 22nd part. He was sure that his noble Friend the late Secretary of State for India would not defend this eviction, because he and others were pledged by their Leader to the doctrine that evictions justified the Plan of the Campaign. He was not aware that there was any record of any public utterances of the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India as to evictions; but he was too faithful and devoted an adherent of the Prime Minister to separate himself from his policy; and he only asked the noble Viscount to carry out in India the admirable provision of the Land Bill for Ireland, which would shortly be before the House, for paper evictions by legal process converting a tenant into a caretaker, and that no actual evictions should take place in India under the Land Acquisition Act until all the appeals had been heard and the cases legally concluded. There were two things which the India Office might suggest to the Secretary of State in answer to the case he had now stated. One was, that the three brothers were not the owners, but only occupancy tenants; and the other, that whatever was done to them was done in due course of law. It would be a mere quibble, which the Secretary of State would not succeed in inducing anyone to believe, to assert that a chief rent of Rs. 5 constituted the owner of it the owner of the whole property; or considering the deed granting Arni Ghat in perpetuity for a chief rent of Rs.5, that the owner of the chief rent had any further interest in or claim to interference with the property; or that persons owning land in perpetuity, subject to the trifling chief rent of Rs.5, were not the real owners. Those who received the chief rents of Scotch fens were termed superior landlords, but they had no rights over the land beyond receiving those chief rents. The mohunt, therefore, ought not to have had an assessor to value Arni Ghat; but this was done in order to give the Government of the North-West Provinces an extra voice against the Zemindars' assessor. As to this expropriation having been carried out according to law, it was stated, in opposition to that view, that the Small Causes Court in which this spoliation was decreed was not a Court competent under the Act to try such a case. It was also stated that the notices and proclamations required by the Act were not made in this case. Notice had to be given in the Government Gazette, and also by beat of drum, or by notices posted on the buildings on the estate or elsewhere, that the land is to be so taken. That many abuses had taken place under this Act was shown by the Circular recently issued and published last month by the Board of Revenue, calling upon the collectors and commissioners to exercise more personal supervision in cases arising out of the Land Acquisition Act. Now, though this expropriation took place a good while ago, it was only comparatively lately that the affair got into the Indian newspapers; and the late Secretary of State for India knew nothing of it, and it was never brought under his notice. The whole responsibility of this injustice and oppression, if it should be upheld, would, therefore, belong to the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India. By responsibility, he did not mean responsibility to Parliament, which was an obsolete and unmeaning phrase, but that responsibility in the next world which could not be evaded, and which the noble Viscount would not be inclined to deride. He would now relate the administrative abuses and arbitrary conduct to which this spoliation led the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Provinces. Mr. Laidman, who had decided this case against the three Zemindars of Arni Ghat, in subsequent proceedings on the 9th of February, 1885, addressed these Rajpoots from the Bench with the words—"Soor! bad-mash! haramzadeh!" or, "Pigs! blackguards! bastards! you have appealed our decree to the High Court;" then he repeated the bad words, and told the peon to turn them out of Court. Captain Hearsey, who was present in Court, and who had befriended these Rajpoots, wrote a letter to The Statesman of Calcutta narrating these unseemly words from the Judicial Bench. For this, Sir Alfred Lyall directed Mr. Laidman to prosecute Captain Hearsey for defamation; he could not brook any criticism even of an unworthy member of the Civil Service. Accordingly, Captain Hearsey was prosecuted in July, 1885. The Chief Justice summed up against the prosecution, and the jury acquitted Captain Hearsey in five minutes. There were seven Christian and two Native jurors; the foreman was the local manager of the Agra Savings Bank, and another juror was connected with another bank. It was naturally to have been expected that Sir Alfred Lyall should have bowed to this judicial decision; but their Lordships would be astonished to learn that he replied by promoting Mr. Laidman to a higher post, with additional salary of Rs.300 a month, although he had just been shown to be unfit for the Bench, and tainted with perjury. It was also stated that he remitted, or ordered to be refunded to Mr. Laidman, the costs which had been given against him in the recent trial. If the Secretary of State should find that Mr. Laidman's costs had been repaid to him out of public money, would he direct that Captain Hearsey also should be reimbursed the Rs.3,000 that he had to pay for his defence? Not satisfied with that he wrote a Minute or Resolution, condemnatory of or adversely criticizing the Chief Justice's judgment, and sent it round in a semi-secret way to his judicial subordinates, for it was sent round to them by a messenger, with orders that they were to take note of it, but not take a copy of it. The Secretary of State would hardly be able to uphold or excuse this method of the Lieutenant Governor of a Province of securing the respect of the junior members of the Judicial Body for the Chief Justice. Their Lordships would probably be told—and, if so, he should entirely concur with the statement—that Sir Alfred Lyall was a man of great ability, culture, and energy, and an ornament of the Indian Civil Service; but he had the defect of caring more for the interests of the Civil Service than for the interests of the people of India; and in these affairs he seemed to have lost his judgment and to have exemplified the saying—Corruptio optimi pessima. Sir Alfred Lyall had, however, done an injury to the Indian Civil Service, since the Press had contrasted his conduct with that of Lord Roay in the Cambay case; and many would be led to say that the Lieutenant Governorships of Bengal and the North-West Provinces ought to be filled up by men fresh from England, and not by members of the Civil Service. The wrong done under the sanction of the Lieutenant Governor had borne fruit, and formed a precedent. Quite recently, the municipality of Mussoorie, when wanting a piece of land for the disposal of their sewage, offered Rs.10,000 to their Vice President for a piece belonging to him; later they wanted to take for Rs.1,000 only a plot from the villagers of Kiar Kuly, half the size of that for which they had offered Rs. 10,000. These villagers escaped from expropriation, because the medical officer would not allow this land to be used for the purpose, as it would have contaminated the water going to the Goorkha lines. The municipality was now attempting to expropriate some other villagers for an inadequate price, and although the matter was not legally concluded, the municipality had taken possession of the land and placed its filth upon it. He concluded by moving for a copy of Sir Alfred Lyall's Resolution on the Judgment of the Chief Justice.

Moved, "For a Copy of Sir Alfred Lyall's Resolution on the Judgment of the Chief Justice."—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross), in reply, said, it was not his intention to enter into the subject of future legislation, or discuss the question generally; he would content himself with simply answering the Question put before him. On the first two clauses of the Question, it would be enough to say that the decision of the subordinate Judge of Dehra Dun in the case referred to by the noble Lord was appealed against in the High Court of the North-West Provinces by the tenants; that their appeal was dismissed with costs, their own counsel admitting that he had no case; and that if there had been in the decision appealed against either any failure in substantial justice or any defect in the form of procedure, it would certainly have been taken notice of by the High Court. As regards the third clause of the Question,

Captain Hearsey stated, in a Memorial received from him, that he had sent to the Viceroy a Petition for transmission to the Secretary of State. He (Viscount Cross) did not propose to take any action, unless he received a representation on the subject from or through the Government of India in the ordinary course.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that he was satisfied with the noble Viscount's reply, as the matter was under the examination of the Indian Government, and he would withdraw the Motion. The noble Viscount, however, had been misinformed as to the appeal.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

IRISH LAND LAW BILL.—(No. 58.)

(The Lord Privy Seal, Earl Cadogan.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

LORD INCHQUIN said, he wished to point out that since the Bill was read a second time, Her Majesty's Government had altered what must be considered as the most important part of the Bill in a very serious way. They had proposed to omit the three Clauses 21, 22, and 23 in the Bill, dealing with the power of the Court to stay eviction, the jurisdiction of the County Court, and the power, in certain cases, to continue the tenant in his holding, notwithstanding his bankruptcy, and substitute new clauses for them of vital importance to Irish landlords generally. Now those clauses had been in the hands of noble Lords but a very short time, and they contained very important provisions indeed, and, although he for one and, he believed, other Irish landlords were perfectly ready to consider those Amendments, if possible, in a favourable manner, they still felt that the Amendments in question were of such vital importance that some time ought to be given, not only for Irish Landlords to consult among themselves as to whether they met the objections previously raised, but also that they might be able to refer the new clauses to those in Ireland who were best able to judge, in order that they might have their opinions to strengthen them in any action they might think fit to take in that House. He wished to know whether, supposing their Lordships agreed to accept temporarily those three clauses, the Government would consent to recommit the Bill subsequently in order that noble lords might have an opportunity of carefully considering them, and, perhaps, proposing Amendments upon them if they were so advised.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, he thought the Amendments met the objections raised on the second reading only to a limited extent. He objected to the clauses as they now stood, however, not on the ground that he did not wish to see some equitable jurisdiction given to County Court Judges, or whoever were to be the authorities eventually under the Act; but, because he did not believe that those County Court Judges could overtake the work which would be thrown upon them if the clauses passed in their present form. He had taken considerable trouble to ascertain, and found that authorities in Ireland and elsewhere entirely coincided with him on that point. Time ought to be given for inquiries into the matter, and he should be exceedingly glad if the Government could see their way to accept the suggestion of his noble Friend (Lord Inchiquin) and leave those subjects an open question until the other clauses, to which he believed very little serious objection would now be made, had been considered.

LORD FITZGERALD said, he would suggest as the most convenient way out of the difficulty, that their Lordships should that evening proceed serialim with the first 20 clauses of the Bill, and that on coming then to the three new clauses, the Government should consent to report Progress, in order that they might resume again on Thursday next. In doing that they would have made very considerable progress with the measure, and one of the objects that would be accomplished by that course would be that their Lordships would be able to consider those very important and interesting clauses, which required to be weighed in every line before becoming the law of the land, besides which they should have a statement and explanation from the Government of the real import and bearing of the clauses.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN was understood to express himself in a similar sense.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) said, that he agreed with the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Fitzgerald) that they should go into Committee at once; but with regard to the question as to what their Lordships should do when they came to the 21st clause, he should be sorry if the House then came to a Resolution such as that suggested by the noble and learned Lord to adjourn for another considerable period. He did not think anything would be gained by that course. If noble Lords were not able to ascertain the import and bearing of the clauses now, they were not likely to do so by Friday. The Government felt the extreme difficulty of the subject in framing the clauses so as to meet every view. That had been felt by everybody who had attempted to deal with it. It was not only difficult in itself, by reason of the state of the law, but on account of the strangely varying testimony with respect to the probable bearing of each portion of the clauses as originally drawn. It required, they might say, an expert to know what Irish tenants would do, and what Irish County Court Judges would do; but the worst of it was that experts were not yet agreed upon the subject, and they directly differed with each other upon it, and, therefore, there was undoubtedly more than usual perplexity and difficulty in adapting the language of the clauses to the necessities of the legislation the Government had in view. He should be extremely sorry if their Lordships, when they reached these clauses, were to adjourn. What the Government wanted was not an adjournment, but discussion, in order to hear from noble Lords precisely what were the objections which they took to the new clauses. By an adjournment before they came to the clauses, they would be as much in the dark as ever as to what noble Lords thought. It was important to know what the danger was which certain noble Lords anticipated; and they could not consider how the language of the clauses should best be drawn, in order to meet these apprehensions until they knew where the danger lay. He would, therefore, deprecate any proposal which would prevent a full discussion of the clauses. If, after the clauses had been discussed, and they had gone through the Bill, it should be the pleasure of the House to recommit the Bill as to these clauses, that would be perfectly in Order, and might, perhaps, meet the views of some of those who had spoken on this subject. It was the desire of the Government to give every facility for bringing this Bill into accordance with the feelings of noble Lords so far as it was consistent with the main object of the Bill. He would, therefore, recommend that they should go on with the Bill that night; and if they did not finish it, they might do so on Friday, and might then recommit it to some day after that.

THE EARL OF KILMOREY said, he hoped that the Government would allow an adjournment after reaching the 21st clause, in consideration of the vital importance of the question to those who were Irish landowners.

House in Committee.

ARRANGEMENT OF CLAUSES.

Amendments of General Application.

Clause 1 (Leaseholders).

LORD FITZGERALD, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 12, after the word "holding," the insertion of the words "and if such lessee so elects," said, the effect of it would be that it should only be on the desire of the leaseholder that he should be admitted to the benefits of the Act of 1881. No application for revision of a lease could thus be made by a landlord. The importance of this Bill could not be over-estimated, and every word of it required to be considered, and every provision read, with the greatest care. The original idea of the Act of 1881 had been to provide protection to yearly tenants against what might prove to be excessive rents, and also to give them security of tenure. He could never see why leaseholders were not admitted to the benefits of the Act of 1881; but he would point out that they ought only to be so on different terms from those given to yearly tenants. That exclusion had created great discontent. It was now proposed that leaseholders, without waiting for the expiration of their leases, should be at once brought within the provisions of the Bill. He only regretted that the principle was not carried further, and extended to all leases, without being confined to those expiring within 60 years of the passing of the Land Act. A Bill extending the provisions of the Act of 1881 to all leaseholders at the election of the lessee had been read a second time with the assent of the Leader of the House of Commons; it was backed by Mr. T. W. Russell, Lord Ernest Hamilton, Mr. Lea, Mr. Johnston, and Mr. Sinclair, all Members, he believed, representing the North of Ireland. There was, however, a large class of leaseholders who did not want their leases interfered with, and who looked with alarm at this impending legislation which would reduce them to yearly tenancies. In some cases, where the leaseholder would find his lease broken without his having a voice in the matter, the rent he would have to pay might be larger than that which he had paid before, owing to his having had a lease fixed at a low rent. He, therefore, proposed the Amendment to meet such cases of leaseholders who did not wish to have their leases broken.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 12, after ("holding,") to insert ("and if such lessee so elects.")—(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN) said, that the Government found it impossible to accede to the Amendment; because, if it were carried out, it would result in a one-sided and unfair state of things. No doubt, it was the object of the Bill to give relief in cases where it was required; but he was not aware that that relief should be given to the leaseholder and not to the landlord. If the Amendment were agreed to, the tenant would have a right to go into the Land Court and have his lease broken, whereas the landlord would have no such right to break a lease if he so desired. He therefore hoped that the noble and learned Lord (Lord Fitzgerald) would not press the Amendment.

LORD HERSCHELL said, he thought that, in one sense, it might be described as one-sided; but, on the other hand, if the clause were adopted without amendment, it would result in a great hardship to many tenants who were now holding under leases, because it was not a mere question of rent. By the Act of 1881, a landlord could resume possession of a farm for his own purposes, or for those of a relation; and a farm held by a leaseholder would be placed in the same position. The object of the Bill was to produce satisfaction and content, by the giving of relief to leaseholders; but unless the Amendment was agreed to, though the clause would give great satisfaction to those who were entitled to go into Court and have their rents reduced, it would produce great dissatisfaction amongst others who came to get the reverse of a benefit in order that their neighbours might be benefited. It was not merely that the landlord would be entitled to have the rent fixed in the lease raised, but the clause would, under certain circumstances, entitle him to resume possession. ["No, no!"] Yes; for the tenant would be thrown into the position of a tenant under the Land Act of 1881, and that measure enabled a landlord, for certain purposes, to resume possession. The clause, unless altered as suggested by the Amendment, would create great dissatisfaction and discontent.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, that, in the interests of the Irish landlords, they ought to support the Amendment. It might appear rather one-sided; but still, with his knowledge of the North of Ireland, he thought the clause required to be amended in the direction suggested. He did not believe the working of the clause, as it stood, would be satisfactory from the tenants' point of view where land was held at a low rent. It would be repugnant to any good landlord to break his tenant's lease against the will of such tenant; and, speaking as an Irish landlord, he appealed to noble Lords who owned land in Ireland to support the Amendment, as being the course which Irish landlords who had not seats in the House would themselves take.

LORD THRING said, he thought the Bill would be most unfair to mortgagees, by breaking leases which might recently have been pledged as valuable securities.

EARL CADOGAN said, the lease would not be at once broken, but only in certain eventualities.

LORD THRING, continuing, said, the clause would break every lease in Ireland, even if the tenant was perfectly satisfied with his position. [Ministerial cries of "No, no!"] Such would, undoubtedly, be the effect of the Bill. It would work immense injustice.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE said, he felt bound to corroborate the statement of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Thring). The clause would at once break every lease in Ireland, for all would be brought under the direct action of the Bill. He could not see why the Government should object to the Amendment. It was only in appearance, and not in reality, that the Amendment was one-sided. The fact that the law enabled A to have his lease broken ought in no way to give the landlord the right of breaking B's lease against B's will. Because one leaseholder got his rent reduced, another leaseholder ought not to be liable to have his raised. If one man were concerned in both operations, it would be just, but different men were concerned. He could not imagine that there was a landlord in Ireland who, having given a beneficial lease to a respectable tenant, would wish to break it, merely because another tenant, whose circumstances were different, was enabled by law to get rid of his lease. He understood and appreciated the reasons which induced the Government to admit leaseholders to the benefits of the Land Act; but he could not approve the limitation of those benefits in the manner proposed by this clause. The Government had accepted the state of the law as they had inherited it from their Predecessors, and were not responsible for it. They retained their former objection to the principle; but they thought it necessary to admit these leaseholders to the benefit of the Act. He could not admit that it was a real and just corollary that when leaseholders wished to remain with their leases, they should be forced to give them up.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBORNE) said, that by the legislation introduced in 1881, the holders of leases which would expire in 60 years after that date were given the right of continuing in possession as present tenants after the expiration of the lease. The present Bill assumed that the 60 years had now expired, and gave at once to leaseholders the same status which they would acquire under the Act of 1881 after the lapse of more than 50 years. They would, in fact, become present tenants, subject to the terms and conditions of the leases held by them. Under the clause under consideration the provisions of each lease would, therefore, remain effective until either the landlord or the tenant should object to them. He would ask if it was reasonable to have an entirely one-sided arrangement by which one of the parties would have the right to examine into the rent, while the other would be denied the right of saying a word on the subject? The unanimous report of the Cowper Commission was to the effect that lessors, as well as lessees, should have a right of application, and all the evidence that he had read taken by the Commission supported that part of the Report. The broad question before them was whether they were to give an option to the tenant alone, and give no voice to the landlord. To that the Government were unable to assent, and, therefore, they could not agree to accept the Amendment of his noble and learned Friend.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, his first feeling on reading the clause was entirely in favour of the contention of the Government; but further consideration, and hearing the remarks of the noble Earl (the Earl of Leitrim) to-night, had induced grave doubts in his mind, whether this would be a power which the landlords of Ireland would be able to exercise. Most of the witnesses examined before Lord Cowper's Commission had also expressed the opinion that the right to break a lease ought not to be given to the landlord. If a landlord had one tenant holding on a lease at a rent which would probably be reduced on application, and two others holding on very low rents, he asked any of their Lordships whether, if he were placed in that position, and the tenant holding at a high rent went and got his lease broken, he would go to the other two tenants and say that because the one tenant had got his lease broken, and his rent reviewed, he must take proceedings in order to have their rents reviewed also? So strong was his feeling in favour of covenant, that he should feel that to be a dishonourable act. No Act of Parliament would ever induce him to go to these men and address them in such language. He rejoiced to hear from a noble Earl, who was an Irish landlord, the true sentiment which he believed would animate the great majority of Irish landlords. He (the Duke of Argyll) felt strongly against the whole principle of the clause. He admitted the argument that if leases were broken in Ireland at all, they should be broken all over the country; but, looking at its abstract application, he felt that the clause as it now stood, and without the Amendment, would be likely to create the greatest possible dissatisfaction in particular parts of Ireland, and, at the same time, fail to supply honourable and generous landlords with any advantage. Good landlords would never break one man's lease with a view to an augmentation of rent because the leases of other tenants had been broken with the result that their rents had been reduced. To break a lease with such an object in view would be what he would again call a dishonourable act, and he did not think so meanly of Irish landlords as to believe them to be capable of it.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he sincerely hoped the Government would see their way to retain the provision in their Bill. If there was an advantage given to one side it should be given to the other. He maintained that a man had a right to elect whether he would come under the Bill or not.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that the clause made it possible to break all leases; but he would ask—was there a single landlord who, because he lost over one lease, would break another lease to the disadvantage of his tenants? He thought that was a sufficient argument to make him vote for his noble Friend.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he hoped they would have some notice taken of the point raised as to mortgages.

LORD MACNAGHTEN expressed the hope that the Government would accept the Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he would point out that, besides the rights of tenants, there were also rights of public law to be considered; and the question was, what had they a right to do in respect to those landlords who were not all represented in that House, and whose rights deserved consideration from them as well as the rights of tenants. The noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Thring) said that the Government did not dissemble their dislike to the Act of 1881; but he (the Marquess of Salisbury) must say that that Act, so far as it dealt with fair rent, professed, at least, to be scrupulously impartial between landlord and tenant; and it provided that, if the tenant might obtain a reduction of too large a rent, the landlord might obtain an increase of too small a rent. The object of the Act, in short, was to give a fair rent. Well, it was found by a great many leaseholders that it was a great hardship on them to be excluded from that legislation, and therefore it was proposed that they should be put in the same position as the tenants whose lot they envied. But the Government were now told that they were not to follow the precedent of the Act of 1881; that they were to enable the rent to be reduced when too high, but that they were not to let it be raised if it were too low. On what ground was that proposed? If the landlords were a race with no rights, then he could understand it; but if Parliament was to hold the balance between the two parties, surely Parliament would first treat the leaseholders as they had treated the tenants-at-will, and allow rents to be raised when they ought to be raised, and lowered when they ought to be lowered. As to mortgagees, it was said—"Suppose that the mortgage had been obtained upon the property subject to this low rent; if you raise the rent, you destroy the security of the mortgagee." Well, but it did not occur to the noble Lord who said that, that the same thing might happen in the opposite direction, and that where a landlord had leased his property and built himself a comfortable house, and possibly mortgaged his land on the security of the leases, he might find, if this Amendment were adopted, his house too large for him and his mortgages broken. He would remind the Committee that there were poor landlords as well as poor tenants in Ireland, and he wanted them to mete out to the poor landlords the same justice that they meted out to the poor tenant. He asked for no advantage for the one over the other in dealing between man and man.

THE EARL of SELBORNE said, he would point out that in the case of yearly tenants, either party could, by a short notice, put an end to the tenancy; and as within those limits of time, either party could alter the terms of the holding, it was manifestly reasonable to say that that there should be the reciprocal right to go into Court and have the rent revised. But now they had two classes to consider besides the landlords. They had the tenants, who had a fixed term and wished to give it up, and they had the tenants who had a fixed term and did not wish to give it up; and he could not see why they should give away the estate of the one because they thought there were reasons of policy for helping the other to relieve themselves from a position in which they did not like to remain.

EARL COWPER said, the Royal Commission had recommended that on every occasion when the rents had been made as low, or lower than Griffith's valuation, the landlord should not have power to bring the tenants into Court. The Government had paid no attention to that recommendation. As he had to decide between the Amendment and allowing leases of all kinds, however low, to be brought into Court, he thought he should be acting least contrary to the recommendation which he had signed, in common with the other Members of the Commission, if he voted for the Amendment.

Amendment disagreed to.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 13, after ("conditions," insert ("and subject to the same right of resumption.")—(The Lord Privy Seal.)

LORD HERSCHELL said, he objected to the Amendment that it would not merely make a leaseholder a present tenant, but would make him a present tenant with something less than the rights of a present tenant, because the landlord would have a special and exceptional right of resumption.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, it would be better that the Amendment should stand over till the Report.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD FITZGERALD said, that in consequence of the decision at which their Lordships had arrived, he would not move the next Amendment which stood on the Paper in his name.

THE EARL OF BELMORE moved an Amendment, providing that the lessee shall not be deemed to be a present tenant where substantial consideration "is shown by the said lease to have been given therefor to the lessor by the lessee," and such lessee objects to being deemed a present tenant.

Amendment moved,

In page 1, line 18, to leave out ("has been given for the said lease," and insert ("is shown by the said lease to have been given therefor to the lessor by the lessee.")—(The Earl of Belmore.)

EARL CADOGAN said, he thought the noble Earl might, perhaps, be satisfied with the Amendment he (Earl Cadogan) had put on the Paper dealing with this point. The Government preferred that Amendment to the one moved by the noble Earl.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

On the Motion of The LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl Cadogan), the following Amendment made:—In line 19, after ("lease,") insert ("to the lessor or with his knowledge").

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, in moving an Amendment providing that the lessee shall not be deemed to be a "present tenant" where substantial consideration has been given for the lease "by the lessee, or by the lessor, and such lessee or lessor objects to the tenant being deemed a present tenant," said, the principle involved in the Proviso was that, in fixing a fair rent, the Act of 1881 laid down that the Court should hear the persons, and having regard to the interests of the landlord and the tenant respectively, and considering all the circumstances of the case and the holding, might determine what a fair rent was. Undoubtedly, under those general words, the Court ought to consider what was paid on the one hand by the landlord, and on the other by the tenant. But it was a great fallacy to suppose that the tenant's was the only case worthy of consideration, and he thought the attention of the Court should be drawn to the valuable consideration, in the form of permanent improvements or otherwise, given by the landlord. His object, therefore, was to protect the landlord in all cases where he had given such valuable consideration. In this connection, he would relate two instances which had been brought to his notice, of tenants of Lord Lansdowne, against whom such an indecent and unjust persecution was being carried on, a persecution which, in all the circumstances of the case, was the most outrageous that had occurred. He happened to have heard of the cases that morning, not from Lord Lansdowne, because he had had no communication with him, but from another source. Of the two persons who were leaders in the agitation, one was a person named Dunn, who held five contiguous farms. The agitators pretended that all the agitation was in favour of poor men holding small holdings; but the principal agitator against Lord Lansdowne was what might well be called a land-grabber, paying a rent of £1,367. He was a capitalist farmer, and not a poor man at all; and he had enjoyed a long lease during prosperous times. Look at the outlay to which Lord Lansdowne had been put regarding these farms. Lord Lansdowne had laid out £2,625 on the drainage of these farms, which sum he received by loan from the Government at 6½ per cent, and for which Lord Lansdowne was only charging Mr. Dunn 2½ per cent, thereby actually losing money largely on the transaction by which this gentleman benefited. The other gentleman to whom he referred was Mr. Kilbride. This gentleman held two farms at a rent of £760. What had Lord Lansdowne laid out on these farms? It was commonly, but most unjustly, said that landlords in Ireland never spent any money on their estates. Lord Lansdowne, in this case, had laid out no less a sum than £3,179, which he had borrowed at 6½ per cent. He had only charged this gentleman, who was hounding Irishmen in Canada against the Viceroy, 4 per cent, he himself paying the balance of 2½ per cent. He maintained it was monstrous, when there were plenty of cases undoubtedly in Ireland of this kind where landlords had expended large sums, that the attention of the Courts should not be directed by the Act of Parliament to cases where the landlord had given valuable consideration, as well as to those cases where the improvements had been effected by the tenants. Even if Lord Lansdowne had not laid out a single sixpence he held that there was a case for compensation. He did not know the length of the leases of those gentlemen or when they expired; but looking at the prices of agricultural produce during the last 30 years, he knew that at least during 20 of those years, prices were so high that there was keen competition for every vacant farm. Seeing that such tenants had enjoyed the benefit of high prices during 20 years, it was neither just nor reasonable that they should be allowed to come into Court, and plead the recent exceptional prices, and get a judicial rent without the attention of the Court being directed to circumstances so clamant as this, and without provision being made for the landlords as regards their expenditures. The reason of the case was quite manifest, and he would conclude, therefore, by moving the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment moved,

In page 1, line 19, to leave out from ("lease") to end of the Proviso, and insert ("by the lessee or by the lessor, and such lessee or lessor objects to the tenant being deemed a present tenant.")—(The Duke of Argyll.)

EARL CADOGAN said, he quite appreciated the point put by the noble Duke, and, undoubtedly, no better illustration could be given of the object of the Amendment than that of the case of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), which had created so much sympathy all over the country. He would suggest, however, to the noble Duke that his object was met by the first paragraph on page 2—

"Provided also, that when under the provisions of this section an application is made to the Court to fix a judicial rent for a holding held under a lease, the Court shall disallow such application if the Court is satisfied that the landlord or his predecessors in title has or have made permanent improvements on the holding, the unexhausted value of which improvements is at the time of making such application not less than four times the yearly rent of the holding."

If those words were not adequate to meet the case put by the noble Duke, the Government, sympathizing with the object, would consider the desirability of amending them.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he did not think the object he had in view would be met by the words quoted; but he would not press his Amendment at the present stage.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD FITZGERALD moved, as an Amendment, to omit altogether the first paragraph on page 2, referred to by the noble Earl (Earl Cadogan). He urged that whereas the Bill was promoted with a view to removing discontent and every sense of injustice, the paragraph in question would involve a most complicated inquiry and litigation, and be a source of dissatisfaction besides being wholly unnecessary.

Amendment moved, in page 2, to omit the first sub-section.—(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

LORD CASTLETOWN earnestly condemned the tribunals which had to carry out the Act of 1851.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that in the particular case of improvements mentioned in the clause, it was necessary that they should have some technical words, as there was a natural prejudice in all minds against people who did not follow the ordinary practice of the country-side, and therefore he thought that they could hardly trust the Court to deal with the matter without words of this nature being inserted. Whether four times the yearly rent was not too much for a calculation of the unexhausted value of the improvements, he was not certain, and they were willing to consider any Amendments upon that subject. Some limitation, however, was necessary. He would frankly confess to noble Lords from Ireland, that it was not merely a care for Irish property that had led the Government to introduce this clause. They were not only anxious to do what was popular and was the cause of contentment, but also to leave upon the Statute Book nothing but provisions that were just in themselves; because they knew from experience, that injustice was prolific, and that an unjust enactment placed upon the Statute Book would produce others still more unjust. He was anxious that they should draw a broad line of distinction between what was alleged to have created the necessity for such legislation in Ireland—namely, the practice of the tenants making improvements, and the case which existed in both parts of this Island. It was very important that that distinction should be clearly established, and, therefore, that some such provision as this should be placed on the Statute Book, especially when they were taking such an exceptional step as breaking leases.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he felt bound to protest against the idea that they had Courts in Ireland administering Land Laws which could not be trusted, and he thought that any legislation which rested upon that contention must be vicious. If Her Majesty's Government held the view that the Courts were not to be trusted, their proper course would have been to bring in a Bill to reform those Courts.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY hoped that there would be no misconstruction placed upon his words. What he did say was, that some of those who had to carry out those Acts were liable, as all men were, to a prejudice in this one particular case.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that it was a very unsafe thing to legislate on the principle of distrust of the Courts. One result of the clause would be, that the present tenants created by the Bill would be on a different footing from all other present tenants in Ireland under the Act of 1881, and confusion would be almost certain to ensue. The proposal contained in the clause, he considered a most unadvisable one to make.

LORD FITZGERALD defended the Courts, which, he said, were presided over by men of very high character.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, what he gathered from the evidence before the Cowper Commission was that no Courts were competent to decide in this case, not because they were dishonest, but because Parliament had given them a function which no Court could discharge. Their Lordships would remember that within two years after the operation of this Act, the Ulster tenants came in a body to Sir George Trevelyan, then Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and remonstrated with him on the rents which were then fixed by the Commissioners, and urged that they were great supporters of the Government of the day. Did the House not remember that, instead of the matter being treated as one for judicial decision, it was considered as one for political action, and that Sir George Trevelyan, honest and honourable man as he was, was obliged to fence with them? He told them the Executive Government had nothing to do with rents; but before the deputation left his room, he distinctly said the Government would keep an eye on these valuations, and if they found the interests of the tenants were not protected, they would know how to apply a remedy. That was the spirit in which the matter was regarded.

EARL SPENCER said, that his recollection of the incident referred to was that the deputation that waited upon the Chief Secretary complained of the system under which valuations had been appointed to the Courts. The answer of the Chief Secretary was explained in the subsequent debate in the House of Commons, when it was shown that the appointment of valuers had not enabled the Commissioners to dispose of the cases with sufficient speed. In fact, he stated in the House of Commons that as due expedition was not shown, the Commissioners, in conjunction with the Government, had decided to alter and reconstitute the Sub-Commission.

LORD CASTLETOWN said, that the principal work under the Land Act fell upon the Land Commissioners, and those were the men in whom they had no confidence.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Amendment moved, to add, at the end of the Clause I., the following Proviso:—

“ Provided, That this section shall not apply to any lease made before the passing of said Act of 1881, where the Court shall be satisfied that, by agreement between the landlord and the tenant of the holding, entered into and made after the passing of said Act of 1881, the rent reserved by the lease has been reduced for the residue of the term.”—(The Earl of Erne.)

EARL CADOGAN said, he could not accept the Amendment, because he thought it was unnecessary. He did not see why the fact that a landlord had entered into an agreement with his tenant to reduce the rent fixed by the lease should disentitle the tenant to have a fair rent fixed. If the reduction made to the tenant by the landlord brought the rent down to a fair rent, then this Court would not interfere with it; whereas, if the reduction did not bring it quite down to a fair rent, the Commissioners would only reduce it to that point.

THE EARL OF CORK said, he thought that the Amendment would be only fair towards landlords who, like himself, had come to amicable terms with their tenants. It would be rather hard that, having reduced their rents for some years past, they should now be placed in a worse position than those landlords who had refused to reduce the rents of those tenants who held under leases. It was no satisfaction to him as a landlord to know that he could go into Court, for he did not wish to do so. In fairness to those landlords who had acted generously, some such provision as that proposed by the noble Earl ought to be inserted in the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that in no way could the clause be unjust, for no reduction would be made to a lower level than the fair rent. He would suggest, therefore, that the noble Earl might be content with an Amendment directing that diminutions of rent resulting from such agreements as he contemplated in his Proviso should be taken into consideration by the Court when fixing a fair rent.

LORD BRAMWELL said, he thought that when a tenant whose rent had been reduced in the circumstances described in the Proviso, repaired to the Land Court to seek a judicial rent, the special bargain between him and the landlord ought to be treated as rescinded, so that the original and not the reduced rent might be taken into consideration. To enact that would be to follow the legal principle, that when a man was dissatisfied with a bargain, he could not retain that portion of it which he considered beneficial to himself, while seeking to be released of the covenants to which he objected. He had not a word to say against those who had been reducing rents in Ireland; but he was satisfied that they felt they had been sent on a mission of reduction.

Amendment disagreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Judicial rent may commence on date of application to the court), agreed to.

Clause 3 (Consolidation of proceedings in ejectment, and application for fair rent).

LORD FITZGERALD moved an Amendment limiting the application of a clause to ejectments brought in Civil Bill Courts. The object of the Amendment, he explained, was to prevent delay.

Amendment agreed to.

Moved, "To omit Sub-section 2 of the Clause."—(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

Motion agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

THE EARL OF ERNE, in moving the addition of a new clause after Clause 3, said, he thought it would be a better arrangement than leaving the selection to the Judges, and he hoped the matter would be considered by the Government.

Amendment moved, after Clause 3, to insert the following Clause:—

"The Lord Lieutenant shall from time to time appoint independent valuers to report to the Judges of the Civil Bill Courts upon all matters which may assist such Judges in determining the fair rent and specified value of a holding. There shall be paid to such valuers such remuneration as the Lord Lieutenant may, with the consent of the Treasury, determine."—(The Earl of Erne.)

EARL SPENCER said, he quite agreed with the noble Earl that it would be better to place this power in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant.

EARL CADOGAN said, the Amendment was out of place; the point would arise on Clause 29.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 4 (Substitution of a written notice for the execution of an ejectment).

On the Motion of The LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl Cadogan) the following Amendments made:—

In page 2, line 37, at the beginning of the clause insert ("in the case of any holding for which a judgment in ejectment for non-payment of rent has been recovered"); and in page 3, line 4, leave out from ("upon") to the end of the line, and insert ("every person served with the writ or process in such ejectment").

Amendment moved,

In line 12, after ("caretaker") insert ("When a person is deemed to have been put into possession of land as a caretaker under this section, he may be removed from possession at any time in the manner provided by law for the recovery of possession of premises occupied by a caretaker; or, at the expiration of the period of redemption, but not sooner, the possession of such land may be recovered by a writ of possession in the prescribed form under the said judgment in ejectment for non-payment of rent save as aforesaid."—(The Lord Privy Seal, Earl Cadogan.)

Amendment agreed to.

LORD INCHQUIN said, he trusted their Lordships would have an opportunity of considering that very important clause when the Bill was re-committed.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Power of surrender by middleman).

EARL CADOGAN, in Sub-section 8, providing that the person to whom a surrender is proposed to be made shall not be bound thereby unless written notice of the intention to surrender be served within three months after the passing of this Act, or within three months after the making of the reduction of rent upon which the right to surrender is founded, proposed, as an Amendment, that "six months" be substituted for "three months" in both cases.

Amendment moved, in page 4, lines 42 and 43, leave out ("three") and insert ("six.")—(The Lord Privy Seal, Earl Cadogan.)

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN proposed an Amendment, providing that where a person claimed to surrender his holding, part of which is sub-let, the Court shall determine the fair rent of the part not sub-let as if it constituted a holding, and the person surrendering were the tenant and the person to whom the surrender is proposed to be made were the landlord of the holding, and such person so claiming shall be deemed to be a tenant of a present tenancy, and such holding shall be subject to all the provisions of the said Act of 1881 with regard to present tenancies, provided that such person has not sub-let any portion of his holding without the consent of his landlord.

Amendment moved,

In page 4, leave out from ("sublet") in line 6 down to the second ("he") in line 8; page 5, Sub-section (9.), line 15, after ("holding") add ("and such person so claiming shall be deemed to be a tenant of a present tenancy, and such holding shall be subject to all the provisions of the said Act of 1881, with regard to present tenancies, provided that such person has not sublet any portion of his holding without the consent of his landlord.")—(The Earl of Milltown.)

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he felt bound to oppose the Amendment, on the ground that it was neither fair nor reasonable.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

LORD CLONCURRY, in moving to add the following sub-section to the clause:—

"The tenant of any holding held under a contract of tenancy made since the passing of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, and made subject to Section 12 or Section 15 of that Act, may surrender his estate in the holding, subject to the provisions of this section," said, that the provision would only apply to a small number of tenants, and enable them to give back the land to the owner when they found that they could not make any profitable use of it. He thought it was a subject worthy the consideration of the Government whether, by extending this clause to the class of tenants to which he referred, they would not conduce to the peace and order of the country.

Amendment moved,

In page 5, line 15, after ("holding") insert—" (10.) The tenant of any holding held under a contract of tenancy, made since the passing of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, and made subject to section twelve or section fifteen of that Act, may surrender his estate in the holding, subject to the provisions of this section."—(The Lord Cloncurry.)

EARL CADOGAN said, he was very unwilling to decline any Amendment proposed by his noble Friend, but he could not accept the proposal which had been made with respect to this particular clause. If his noble Friend brought up a separate clause on the Report stage the Government would consider it; but at present, he regretted to say, they must oppose the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

On the Motion of The Lord FITZGERALD, the following Amendment made:—To add the following section at the end of clause:—

"Where any estate in land is surrendered under this section all sub-tenants of the person surrendering such estate shall thereupon become tenants to the person to whom such surrender is made at the rents and subject to the conditions of their sub-tenancies under the person so surrendering."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment moved, to insert the following new clauses in page 5, after Clause 5:—

"(6.) During the continuance of a statutory term in a tenancy, application by the landlord to authorize the resumption of a holding, or any part thereof, by him for some purpose having relation to the good of the holding or of the estate shall be entertained by the court, the modification in Section 8, Sub-section 3, of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, notwithstanding."

"(7.) Where the rent of any holding has been or may be increased, in respect of capital laid out by the landlord under agreement with the tenant, as provided by Section 5 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, the rent fixed by such agreement shall be deemed a fair rent during the term specified in such agreement, and until the expiry of such term no application for the alteration of such rent shall be entertained by the court."—(The Duke of Argyll.)

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he would admit that the question raised by the Amendment was one of considerable importance; but he would suggest that, pending the careful consideration of it by the Lord Privy Seal and himself, it might not be pressed in the meantime.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he supported the Amendment in the interest of the labourers, for whom it was difficult to procure gardens and allotments near villages as the law stood at present.

LORD INCHQUIN said, he trusted the Government would favourably consider the Amendment, which he likewise regarded as affording the most important means of providing accommodation for the labourers.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that, while unwilling to press the Amendment in face of the opposition of the noble and learned Lord opposite, he hoped the Government would further consider the point. It was not in the interest of the landlords alone, but in the interest of all parties, that around all towns and cities in Ireland, as elsewhere, there should be ground available for building extensions.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Amendment moved,

After Clause 5, to insert as a new clause—
“The provisions of the twenty-first section of the Act of 1881 with regard to leases, the acceptance of which by tenants was procured by threat of eviction or undue influence, shall apply to all grants in perpetuity executed since the first day of January, 1869, the execution of which has been so procured, provided that application to the Court be made within six months after the passing of this Act.”—(The Earl of Milltown.)

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he hoped that the noble Earl would withdraw this clause. He (Lord Ashbourne) thought that, under all the circumstances, it would be desirable not to complicate the Bill by the insertion of such a clause.

Clause 6 (Town parks).

LORD INCHQUIN, in moving an Amendment by which any parcel of land let as accommodation land, and not as a farm, contiguous to any village or town, should be deemed to constitute a town park, and not a present tenancy, said, that his object was similar to that which the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll) had in view in a former Amendment, except that it did not provide for town buildings' extensions, but almost exclusively for allotments. The Amendment was simply to enable the landlords to let any land as accommodation land when it was contiguous to buildings, villages, and towns.

Amendment moved,

In page 5, line 20, after (“1881”) insert (“and any parcel of land which has been or may hereafter be let as accommodation land, and not as a farm, contiguous to any village or town, shall be deemed to constitute a ‘town park’ and shall not be deemed to be a ‘present tenancy’ within the meaning of the said Act.”) (The Lord Inchiquin.)

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, he thought that if town parks were to be abolished, it should be directly, and not by a side wind. The clause in the Bill did not alter the law with regard to town parks, but merely defined what the law was. He preferred the Amendment of which he had given Notice, and which he was proceeding to read, when—

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES: We are now considering the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord Inchiquin).

LORD MACNAGHTEN opposed the Amendment.

LORD ASHBOURNE, in opposing the Amendment on behalf of the Government, said, although it was only intended as an addition to the clause, it seemed to contradict the clause itself, and to offer an absolutely new definition of the purpose of accommodation land. It was also an absolutely new departure in the law of Ireland. The Government could not advise the Committee to accept it.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 16; Not-Contents 76: Majority 60.

Amendment disagreed to.

Amendment moved, to leave out Clause 6, and insert following clause—

“A parcel of land shall not be deemed to constitute a town park unless it is or has been used substantially as accommodation land, and is in other respects within the definition of the expression ‘town park’ in the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881: Provided always, that no parcel of land shall lose, or be deemed to have lost, its character of a town park by reason only that the person in occupation of the same shall have ceased after he became tenant thereof to live in such city or town, or the suburbs thereof, as in the said definition mentioned, or by reason of the holding becoming vested by succession, assignment, bequest, or act and operation of law in some person not residing in such city or town, or the suburbs thereof.”—(The Earl of Belmore.)

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that the difficulty sought to be cured was that caused by the words "let to be used" in the clause as it now stood in the Bill. Similar words had been used with respect to grazing farms in the Land Act of 1870; and the Courts had held that the only way to prove such letting was by the production of an agreement in writing, which, in the case of town parks, could hardly ever be done. As regarded the latter part of the Amendment, it had been recently reluctantly decided to be the law, by the Head Commissioners, on appeal, at Omagh, that a person who had resided in a town, when he originally took a town park, could, by simply going to reside in the country, take the town park with him out of the definition as given in the Land Act of 1881, in breach of the intention of that Act. The Amendment he proposed was to meet that state of things.

EARL CADOGAN said, he could not agree to accept the Amendment of the noble Earl, but he agreed that it was a very serious subject, and the Government would be quite willing to amend their own clause in order to meet the views of the noble Earl, and he would bring up a new clause for that purpose on Report.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN said, he was glad that the Government were going to consider the matter, because the subject of town parks was of the greatest importance in Ireland.

THE EARL OF BELMORE accepted the noble Earl's (Earl Cadogan's) offer.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Purchase of Land.

Clause 7 (Investment of guarantee deposit).

LORD CASTLETOWN proposed an Amendment to give power to invest, in addition to the securities mentioned in the Bill, in any debentures or debenture stock issued under the Local Loans Act, 1875, or in any Corporation or township stock, of any Municipal Corporation or township in Great Britain or Ireland issued under the authority of any Act of Parliament. That would give wider powers to the trustees as to the investment of trust moneys.

Amendment moved,

In page 5, line 29, after ("moneys") insert ("or in any debentures or debenture stock issued under the Local Loans Act, 1875, or in any corporation or township stock of any Municipal Corporation or township in Great Britain or Ireland issued under the authority of any Act of Parliament.")—(The Lord Castletown.)

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he had no objection provided it was reasonably safe. He did not know whether the noble Lord had taken advice on the subject; but he should be glad if he would communicate with him between now and the Report.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

LORD CASTLETOWN moved, as an Amendment, after Clause 7 to insert the following:—

"The Land Commission may make an advance to a tenant who is purchasing his holding of the whole principal sum or price payable by the tenant, without requiring the repayment of the advance to be secured by a guarantee deposit, if the Land Commission are satisfied that the security is reasonably sufficient without such deposit."

He thought it was a perfectly legitimate demand to ask the Government to advance the whole of the purchase-money on the terms provided in the proposed clause, as the owner or occupier might have all his capital invested in the holding, and might be unable to deposit the one-fifth of the price required by the Act of 1885. He had great pleasure in bearing high testimony to the regular and honourable manner in which loans were paid in instalments by Irish borrowers, and would refer to Mr. Henry Fowler, late Secretary to the Treasury, who had declared that he was perfectly astonished at the regularity with which the loans and interest had been paid, and which would compare favourably with the way in which loans were paid in any other portion of the Empire. What he (Lord Castletown) proposed was that they should assent to the whole loans where there was ample security.

Amendment moved,

In page 5, after Clause 7, insert following clause:—"The Land Commission may make an advance to a tenant who is purchasing his holding of the whole principal sum or price payable by the tenant, without requiring the repayment of the advance to be secured by guarantee deposit, if the Land Commission are satisfied that the security is reasonably sufficient without such deposit."—(The Lord Castletown.)

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, it had been pointed out to him that the fact of a deposit of one-fifth being required in all cases interfered with the sale of mortgaged estates, because the mortgagees generally wanted their money down. He supported the Amendment.

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he was afraid it was quite impossible to accept the Amendment. In the Act of 1881 various attempts had been made to deal with this very question, and great difficulty was felt as to how the whole of the purchase-money could be advanced in safety. It was thought one-fifth was required as security. No such arrangement as that proposed in the Amendment could be made without the serious examination of it by the Treasury.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause 8 (Trust funds may be applied as a guarantee deposit) agreed to.

Clause 9 (Duty of Land Commission with respect to enforcement of arrears) agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 10 (Expediting proceedings on sales) agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 11 (Crown rents, quit rents, and tithe rent charge).

LORD MONTEAGLE, in moving as an Amendment to insert after "quit rent" the words "head rent," said, that difficulties had arisen in dealing with the owners of head rents in many instances, and he had known cases where the sale of land had been stopped through the owner of the head rent refusing to sell on any terms whatever, while, in other cases, a practically prohibitive price had been demanded, which came to the same thing. That was a serious matter, deserving the attention of the House and the Government; and he thought that something ought to be done to carry further the principle they had adopted in regard to that question.

LORD ASHBOURNE said, that that question had been very fully considered and discussed in connection with the Land Purchase Act of 1885, and many representations were made on the subject. The people who were not owners of head rents were willing that they should be sub-divided; but those who owned head rents objected to it very much, urging that it would enormously diminish the value of their property, if, for example, a head rent of £100 or £200, payable at present by one person, were made payable by a large number of persons, which would necessitate the employment of an agent for the purpose. It was, therefore, said that it would be unjust to fritter away in that manner the property of the owners of head rents who were in the possession of a secure income without any trouble to themselves. Under all the circumstances, although he quite recognized and sympathized with the object in view, he feared it was not practicable to deal with the matter in the way now suggested.

THE EARL OF BELMORE had come to the conclusion, having given a good deal of attention to the matter, that it would be necessary to introduce compulsory sale of head rents on fair terms.

EARL SPENCER said, he feared that as long as those head rents existed it would be almost impossible to get a satisfactory system of purchase of land by the occupier, and if the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Ashbourne) could remove that particular difficulty, much would be done to facilitate the working of such a system in Ireland.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

On the Motion of The LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl Cadogan) the following Amendments made:—In lines 16, 18, and 24, after ("rent charge") insert ("Land Improvement Charge").

LORD CASTLETOWN proposed an Amendment for the purpose of providing that when any holding sold to a tenant under the Land Law (Ireland) Acts was subject with other lands to any Crown rent, quit rent, tithe rent charge, drainage charge, "terminable annuity or rent charge," the Land Commission may apportion such rent or charge between the holding and the other land in such manner as seemed to them equitable.

Amendment moved,

In page 7, line 16, leave out (" or ") and in same line after (" drainage charge ") insert (" terminable annuity or rent charge.")—The Lord Castletown.

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he could not accept the Amendment, because it would interfere with private rights. He would, however, consider the matter, and communicate with his noble Friend before the Report stage.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

On the Motion of The LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl Cadogan) the following Amendment made:—In line 26, at end of line, add as a new sub-section—

"(3.) No such apportionment or redemption of Crown rent shall be made without the previous consent of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and no such apportionment or redemption of tithe rentcharge payable to the Land Commission, or of Land Improvement Charge or of drainage charge payable to the Commissioners of Public Works, shall be made without the previous consent of the Commissioners of the Treasury.

"For the purpose of this section, the Commissioners of the Treasury may from time to time make rules for regulating the mode of giving consents, and the terms upon which consents shall be given."

Amendment moved, to add at end of Clause the following sub-section:—

"The Land Commission may, if they think it expedient, order the redemption of any head rent, or any apportioned part thereof, at a price to be fixed by arbitration in the manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts."

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he would consider the question, with the object of seeing what could be done at a later stage, and must, therefore, ask the noble Lord not to press the Amendment on that occasion.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, he would not press his Amendment at that stage.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 12 (Limit on the amount of advance by the Land Commission); and Clause 13 (Charging order for securing repayment of an advance), separately agreed to.

Clause 14 (Priority of charge for advance) struck out of the Bill.

Clause 15 (Writ of possession) agreed to.

Clause 16 (Specific performance).

On the Motion of The LORD CASTLETOWN, the following Amendment made:—In page 8, line 22, after (" when ") insert (" either before or after the passing of this Act "), and in same line leave out (" is ") and insert (" has been ").

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN proposed to add to the clause words providing that when the Land Commission refuse to sanction a sale agreed upon by the landlord and tenant, they shall, upon the application of either landlord or tenant, state the grounds upon which such refusal is based. He held that this was only reasonable and just, and that it was perfectly monstrous that two gentlemen should be allowed to upset the working of the Land Purchase Act without giving any reason whatever.

Amendment moved,

In page 8, line 32, after (" Commission ") add—" When the Land Commission refuse to sanction such sale as aforesaid, they shall, upon the application of either landlord or tenant, state the grounds upon which such refusal is based."—(The Earl of Milltown.)

LORD ASHBOURNE said, it was impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

LORD MONTEAGLE, in moving to insert after Clause 16 a clause providing that upon the completion of any sale under the Land Law (Ireland) Acts, or the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, the title to each holding, as well as deeds, mortgages, and other charges affecting it, should be recorded in the office of the Land Commission, and not in the Registry of Deeds, and that the Land Commission should make rules and prescribe forms for the purpose of carrying this provision into effect, contended that it was in the interest both of those who were to be the purchasers and of the vendor that the security should be as good as possible. In his opinion, this was a singularly favourable opportunity for providing machinery for the registering of land which was purchased.

Amendment moved, after Clause 16, page 8, insert the following Clause:—

"(1.) Upon the completion of any sale under the Land Law (Ireland) Acts, or the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, the title to each holding shall be recorded in the office of the Land Commission, in such manner and form as the Land Commission shall prescribe.

"(2.) The vesting order or conveyance transferring such holding shall not be registered in the Registry of Deeds, but in lieu thereof a memorandum stating that each vesting order or conveyance has been made and recorded, shall be lodged by the Land Commission in the Registry of Deeds, and shall be registered therein.

"(3.) From and after the recording of any such title to a holding as aforesaid, the operation of the statutes relating to the Registry of Deeds in Ireland shall, as from the date of such recording and with respect to any subsequent dealings with such holding by way of transfer or charge or otherwise howsoever, cease to be applicable thereto.

"(4.) All transfers and mortgages of any holding so recorded, and all charges, incumbrances, bonds, writings, deeds, and things whatsoever which may commence to affect such holdings after the recording of the title thereto, shall be recorded in the office of the Land Commission, and shall not be registered either in the Registry of Deeds or in the Registry of Judgments.

"(5.) All such transfers, mortgages, charges, incumbrances, bonds, writings, deeds, and things, shall, as between themselves, take priority according to the date at which they are recorded.

"(6.) The Land Commission shall make rules and prescribe forms for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this section."—
(The Lord Monteagle.)

LORD CASTLETOWN said, he hoped that the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Ashbourne) would make such arrangements with the Land Commissioners as would enable them to register the transfer of holdings, so that in future any holding could be easily traced.

LORD ASHBOURNE said, that this was a matter which required close and nice consideration, on account of the question of priorities which was introduced by the section. He could not interfere with the arrangements of the Land Commissioners; but he would consider the question and would apply to those upon whom it was sought to cast the administration of this matter. The proposed clause, he thought, was not workable.

LORD THRING said, he thought that it was desirable, in the interest of both tenant and landlord, that there should be a system of registry of title. He could not see that there was the slightest difficulty in the way.

LORD HERSCHELL said, he did not know how it could be given effect to;

but the object which the noble Lord (Lord Monteagle) sought to obtain by this Amendment was one of the utmost importance. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Ashbourne) had said that he would obtain the opinion of the Land Commission upon it; and he (Lord Herschell) would admit that it was necessary that the noble and learned Lord opposite should consult with those whose business it was to administer the Act; but, as that body might naturally see with an exaggerating eye the difficulties that might arise, he hoped at the same time that the noble and learned Lord would exercise his own independent judgment in the matter.

LORD FITZGERALD said, that a system of registration must be compulsory to be of any effect, and he thought that this was a good opportunity for establishing it.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Appeals.

Clause 17 (Provision for hearing of appeals under the Land Act).

EARL SPENCER said, that it might be convenient if he made some general remarks upon the clause before they came to the Amendments which were upon the Paper. The Government were strengthening the Appeal Courts of the Land Commission, with the view, presumably, of meeting the amount of work that would come before it if this Bill became law. At the present moment he understood that the arrears pending before the Commission numbered only 3,000, and he expected that the Commission would shortly reduce them. He further understood that a certain arrangement with regard to three months' notice would still further clear the list of a great many cases. He would like to hear the views of the Government with regard to this matter. He thought that the clause as it stood left a great deal too much to the discretion of the Irish Government. It practically left it to the Lord Lieutenant to constitute two Courts for the purpose of hearing appeals. If he was not mistaken, he believed that under the Act of 1881 it was necessary that the Courts of Appeal should consist of three persons, and he imagined that it was the intention of the Government now that the Courts should be so constituted. In his opinion the Lord Lieutenant had too much power thrown upon him. Judges of the High Court could be introduced for the purpose of carrying out the Act; and if the Lord Lieutenant were given the powers which it was proposed to confer upon him, he might even make one of them preside over the Court. He did not suppose, however, that that was the intention of the Government. The Court had originally consisted of Mr. Justice O'Hagan, Mr. Vernon—whose death they all deplored, and who had done such admirable service—and Mr. Litton. Mr. Litton had now been engaged for many years as one of the Chief Commissioners, and it would be unfair that he should be liable to be superseded in the Presidency of the second Court. With his great experience and legal knowledge it would be far better that he should preside in a second Court of Appeal than that even a Judge of the High Court should do so. Then the clause provided that the Lord Lieutenant might nominate a County Court Judge to be a member of the Court to hear appeals. There were County Court Judges and County Court Judges, and it would be well if the names of the County Court Judges eligible to be so nominated were put into the Bill. He reserved his right to move Amendments to this clause on the Report.

LORD ASHBOURNE said, that one of the complaints about the administration of the Land Act of 1881 had been the delay in the hearing of appeals, which was often as long as three years. There were now as many as 3,000 or 4,000 appeals waiting to be heard, and, therefore, it was deemed advisable to take powers in this Bill for constituting, if necessary, a second Court of Appeal to expedite their hearing. Mr. Justice O'Hagan would naturally preside in one Court, and the Judge of the High Court, who would be called upon to assist, would naturally preside over the second, and would, of course, take precedence of Mr. Litton. With regard to the County Court Judges, he could not agree that it would be well to name them in the Bill. The Bill was constructed, not on the basis of creating new officers at great expense, or to provide a new and continuous Appellate Division, but to give power to the Executive, from time to time, to make the appointments when the necessity arose for them. He thought the clause was one that was likely to work fairly and satisfactorily.

LORD HERSCHELL asked, whether a County Court Judge called in to assist would take precedence of Mr. Commissioner Litton?

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he had not considered that delicate point; but he felt inclined to think that Mr. Litton would have precedence over a County Court Judge.

THE EARL OF ERNE proposed, as an Amendment, that the additional members of the Land Commission to be appointed should be laymen, and not lawyers. There was, he thought, an undue proportion of lawyers upon it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY stated that they did not propose that the County Court Judges selected to administer the Act should be County Court Judges and Land Commissioners too. Somebody else would be appointed for the time to do their County Court work.

LORD ASHBOURNE said, he would point out that the constitution of the Land Commission would have to be considered in August, 1888; and if they did not appoint officials who had already posts which gave them permanence of tenure, they must supply their places by men who would only be employed for a few months. That was not desirable. Her Majesty's Government did not suggest that they would have permanent work; but they might be occasionally required to assist in the Commission to keep down arrears.

EARL CADOGAN said, he could not accept the Amendment. The Land Commission would by effluxion of time come to an end next year, and it would then have to be reconstituted. It would not be well to anticipate that now.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE EARL OF ERNE moved an Amendment, with the object of excluding County Court Judges from service upon the divisions of the Land Commission to be hereafter constituted. He did not for a moment doubt the capacity of the County Court Judges to fulfil the duties which the clause would impose upon them, but he thought that they were already sufficiently burdened with work.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI supported the Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY pointed out that the County Court Judges who were appointed Land Commissioners would not have to discharge their ordinary duties, some other official being appointed to do the work. Consequently, the argument that they would be over-burdened fell to the ground.

LORD ASHBOURNE said, that the tribunal must be composed somehow. The precedent followed by the Government in this case was drawn from a Bill drafted three years ago, when Sir George Trevelyan was Chief Secretary for Ireland. It was not thought desirable to fill the tribunal with officials who did not hold permanent appointments. The Land Commission must be reconstituted before August, 1888, and during the interval it would be well to take advantage of the services of men of experience, whose tenure of office was durable. If the County Court Judges were excluded from the appellate tribunal, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to find other permanent officials equally well fitted to discharge the functions of that Court. Besides, they would only serve in case their assistance was needed to keep down appeals.

EARL SPENCER said, he still maintained that it would be much better to specify accurately the constitution of the Court in the Bill than to leave it for settlement by the Lord Lieutenant. He hoped that the noble and learned Lord would consent to name the County Court Judges who would be appointed. He also thought that power should be given to the Lord Chancellor to direct any Judge appointed after the passing of the Act to sit, if necessary, in this Court of Appeal on land cases.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 19 (Procedure on appeals).

LORD CASTLETOWN (for Lord SUDELEY), in moving to insert words providing that the independent valuer shall, in all cases, report to the Commissioners his opinion as to the amount of the judicial rent of the holding, and the basis on which he has arrived at such opinion; and shall accompany his Report with an Ordinance map of the holding, and a statement of such facts and circumstances as may be required for the purpose of enabling the Land Commission to form a judgment as to the subject-matter of such Report; and, further, that the appointment of valuers shall be vested in the Lord Lieutenant, such valuers to be sworn in the same manner as Judges of the High Court of Justice are sworn, said, he believed that would be a very useful provision, and that it would result in producing a valuable history of the holding.

Amendment moved,

To add at the end of clause—"Such valuer shall in all cases report to the Commissioners his opinion as to the amount of the judicial rent of the holding, and the basis on which he has arrived at such opinion; and shall accompany his report with an ordinance map of the holding and a statement of such facts and circumstances as may be required for the purpose of enabling the Land Commission to form a judgment as to the subject-matter of such report. Every such report shall be filed, and may be inspected by the parties, a reasonable time before the sitting of the Land Commission, or the Division thereof which is to hear the appeal, or re-hear the case to which such report refers; and any party shall be entitled to an office or certified copy thereof on payment of such reasonable charge as shall be prescribed.

"The power of appointing valuers under the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, and this Act, is hereby vested in the Lord Lieutenant, who shall, on the requisition of the Land Commission, exercise the same; and every commissioner, sub-commissioner, and valuer appointed after the passing of this Act, shall be sworn in the same manner as judges in the High Court of Justice are now by law required to be sworn."—(The Lord Castletown.)

EARL CADOGAN said, he was under the impression that the object desired could be attained by rules; but he should accept the Amendment with certain alterations as to phraseology, which he should be prepared to state on Report.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remission of Local Rates.

Clause 20 (Remission of local rates).

On the Motion of The LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl Cadogan) the following Amendment made:—

"(4.) Where any poor rate is remitted under this section in respect of land let at a rent, the third section of the Act of the Session of the sixth and seventh years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter 92, shall apply."

On the Motion of The Lord MONT-EAGLE, the following Amendment made:—

("5.) No poor-rate collector or barony constable shall be required to pay under his warrant any rate or cess which has been remitted by an order under this section."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

LORD FITZGERALD said, that at that point (11.30) he must appeal to the noble Marquess at the head of the Government to allow the further consideration of the clauses of the Bill in Committee to be now adjourned.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not propose that they should have an All-night Sitting on their Bill; but he would now consent to report Progress, and desired to proceed again with the discussion in Committee to-morrow. With regard to an adjournment for the further consideration of the Bill, as had been hinted at in some quarters, over the Whitsun holidays, he did not think that, if such an adjournment took place, it would make much difference. This Bill depended upon the measure in the other House, and at present the sister Bill was not making much progress. They did not propose to send this Bill to the other House until the other measure was safe from its dangers there. There was no absolute pressure for their speed.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he hoped the noble Marquess would see his way to go on with the Bill after the holidays. The amended clauses were of vital importance, and their Lordships had no time to consider Amendments. They could not possibly do it before the holidays.

LORD FITZGERALD said, he had a very important Amendment to propose on Clause 21, the object of which was to render the Bankruptcy Clauses wholly unnecessary.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that if their Lordships did not take the Bill up to-morrow its consideration must be put off until after Whitsuntide. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland had business to transact in Ireland, and Friday was the only other day conveniently at their disposal. On the whole, therefore, he thought it would be better to go on, and the Bill would be put down for to-morrow (Tuesday), when, if their Lordships should still be of opinion that there had not been sufficient opportunity for considering the important Clauses 21, 22, and 23, which followed the point at which they had adjourned, the Government would consent either to adjourn the further progress of the Bill until after Whitsun, or would have the measure re-committed in regard to those particular clauses.

House resumed; House to be again in Committee To-morrow.

JUBILEE SERVICE IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—QUARTER SESSIONS AND ASSIZES.

MR. SHIRLEY (Yorkshire, W.R., Doncaster) asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he will take steps to prevent ordinary Quarter Sessions cases from being tried at the Assizes; and, if he will explain on what principle or system counsel are selected to conduct Treasury prosecutions at Quarter Sessions and Assizes?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight), in reply, said, he had no power to prevent ordinary Sessions cases being taken at Assizes. The Government intended to introduce a Bill on the subject; but the present state of Public Business made it extremely improbable that they would be able to do so at an early date. The selection of counsel to conduct Treasury prosecutions rested with the Attorney General.

BOARD OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—ANNADOWN NATIONAL SCHOOL, CO. DOWN.

MR. KER (Down, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Board of National Education (Ireland) has refused to approve of the appointment of a monitor for the Annadown National School, County Down, which has an average attendance for the last year far in excess of that required by the Rules of the Board, and that the master has generally between 40 and 60 pupils to attend to without any assistance?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, the Board of National Education stated they were obliged to refuse their sanction to this appointment, amongst others, owing to the temporary excess of pupils. The 1st of July in each year was the day fixed for sanctioning new appointments of monitors. Any representation then made by Inspectors would be fully considered by the Commissioners.

BOARD OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—AUGHIOGAN NATIONAL SCHOOL, CO. TYRONE—THE "WORKMISTRESS."

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will state the grounds upon which the Board of National Education made an Order, dated 1st February, 1887, altering the status of the workmistress of the Aughiogan National School, County Tyrone, by making her position that of "temporary workmistress;" and, whether the average attendance, which regulates the status of such teachers, warranted the alteration referred to?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, it appeared that the manager of this school appointed a female temporary assistant, and afterwards appointed a workmistress. The Board of National Education could not, therefore, under their rules, pay the salary of a workmistress and a female temporary assistant at the same time; but to meet the case they decided to grant a salary to a temporary female assistant if the average attendance was 170 children, and a salary of workmistress if the average attendance reached 200 children.

BOARD OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—MILLTOWN NATIONAL SCHOOL, CO. TYRONE.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is usual to compel workmistresses, who have been already recognized as such by the Board of National Education, to submit to re-examination in certain branches of the subject which they teach, and upon what grounds the Commissioners of Education have ordered a further examination of Miss Daly, of the Milltown National School, County Tyrone, in view of the fact that her appointment has been already ratified by the Education Board?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, it was not usual, except in special cases, to compel workmistresses to be re-examined. In the case referred to, the Commissioners of National Education reported that Miss Daly was merely examined in one branch in which she had not previously obtained a place in her examination.

TRAMWAYS (IRELAND)—LINE BETWEEN SCHULL AND SKIBBEREEN.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that the line of tramway between Schull and Skibbereen has become a complete failure, owing to the manner in which it has been constructed; and, whether, considering the fact that a Government Engineer has certified that the line has been properly made, the Treasury will come to the relief of the ratepayers, who are liable for the money advanced for the promotion of the scheme?

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth) (who replied) said: An Inspecting Officer of the Board of Trade reported that the Schull and Skibbereen Tramway and Light Railway was fit for public traffic; and in September last a certificate to this effect was issued, the speed of trains being limited to a low rate over certain parts of the line. It is now understood that the traffic has been stopped, owing to the failure of the engines employed. But, in consequence of representations made by 20 ratepayers of the district to the Board of Trade, orders have been given that an inquiry shall be held, at an early date, under the provisions of the 45th section of the Order in Council, which authorized the construction of the tramway.

ASYLUMS (IRELAND)—MONAGHAN DISTRICT LUNATIC ASYLUM.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that Her Majesty's Inspectors of Asylums for the Poor in Ireland, in their Annual Report, dated March 9, 1886, of the Monaghan District Lunatic Asylum, state—

"The ceilings in many parts of the establishment require repair, and some of the corridors on the ground would be improved if boarded, as the female patients undress in them previous to going to bed. This the resident physician will have attended to by bringing the subject before the Board at their next meeting.

"With reference to waterclosets and means of personal ablution, much improvement is requisite which, I think, will be fully carried out before the existing building contract will have terminated ;"

whether the dividing walls between the several departments are not carried up to the roof, as is required in all public institutions in England, as a check on the spread of fire; whether diphtheria has recently broken out in the asylum; whether the resident medical officer and Visiting Committee have frequently urged the Board to carry out the Inspector's recommendations; whether it is a fact that these alterations have not yet been made; and, will he take steps to compel the Board of Governors to carry out the Inspector's recommendations without further delay?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: Arrangements are being made to have the necessary improvements carried out at the Monaghan District Lunatic Asylum. Diphtheria has not, it appears, recently broken out; and one of the Inspectors who visited the asylum towards the end of last March found the sanitary condition of the patients so satisfactory that only four out of the entire number of 465 were confined to bed.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (IRELAND)—DERRY BRIDGE COMMISSIONERS.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (Londonderry City) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Act under which the Derry Bridge Commissioners are appointed gives them the exclusive right of ferryage across the River Foyle, at Derry?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, that this Question related to the interpretation of an Act of Parliament; and, therefore, the hon. Member would see that the Irish Government could hardly give an answer to it.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—MONAGHAN UNION—NOTICE TO GUARDIANS.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that Miss Gertrude Ross, Mr. Dacre Hamilton, and Colonel Forster, landlords within the Monaghan Union, have notified the Guardians of their intention of evicting 65 families, their tenants, forthwith; whether it is true that two large wings of the workhouse at Monaghan are at present occupied by the Monaghan Militia, assembled for their annual training; whether, in consequence, the Guardians will be unable to provide accommodation for these tenants if evicted; and, whether, under the circumstances, the Government will refuse to give any assistance in carrying out these evictions until the Militia are disbanded, and the Guardians are thus enabled to provide shelter for them?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: It appears that the landlords named have served the relieving officer with notices of eviction in the case of 61 families. The two wings of the workhouse are at present occupied by the Monaghan Militia, but will be vacated by them on the 28th instant. The Guardians of the Union report that there is ample accommodation for these tenants in the workhouse, independent of the portions temporarily occupied by the Militia, should there be a great influx of paupers through the carrying out of the evictions. The Guardians, however, do not seem to anticipate that such an influx will result from the evictions:

LABOURERS' ACTS (IRELAND)—THE RETURN.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When the Return showing the working of the Labourers' Acts (Ireland), ordered on 5th April, 1887, will be laid upon the Table?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: The information required for this Return is being obtained from the Clerks of Unions. Some of the clerks have not yet supplied it, and the statement of several have been returned for explanation. It is not possible to say at present when the Return will be ready to lay upon the Table; but no time shall be lost in preparing it.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN — HOLIDAY IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he will consider the propriety of permitting that when the 50th anniversary of the Accession to the Crown of Her Gracious Majesty shall be celebrated in any elementary schools by a whole holiday, the scholars shall, in the interest of the teachers and of themselves, have credit for two attendances, in the same way as two attendances are credited to scholars when an elementary school is used for election purposes?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The two attendances to which my hon. Friend refers are credited to scholars by a special provision of the Code to meet the case of a compulsory closing of a school under the Ballot Act; but, glad as I should be to meet the wishes of those who desire to celebrate the Jubilee in the way suggested, I am advised that the Department have no power in the matter, and that the holiday must be given under the usual conditions.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—JOSEPH WATT, RELIEVING OFFICER OF THE BELFAST UNION.

MR. LEAHY (Kildare, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that owing to the reported drunkenness and neglect of duty of Joseph Watt, one of the relieving officers of the Belfast Union, at a meeting held on the 3rd May, 1887, the Guardians decided and directed that Watt's conduct for the ensuing week should be closely watched to see if any improvement would set in, and that as the result Watt was drunk, to the knowledge of several officers of the Union and others, and did not attend to the Barrack Street Dispensary for several days; is he aware that Watt's conduct was brought home to the knowledge of a large Board of the Guardians on the 10th May, 1887, and that his services are still retained without admonition or reproof; and, what action does the Local Government Board intend to take in the matter?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, he had already stated twice, he thought, in reply to Questions on this subject, that this relieving officer was obliged to retire from the meeting of the Board on the 3rd instant owing to illness. The Guardians on the day in question did not give any instructions that Watt should be watched to ascertain whether he was intoxicated. His non-attendance, reported due to illness, was confirmed by a medical certificate, which was laid before the Guardians at their meeting on the 10th instant. The

Colonel King-Harman

Local Government Board did not see any ground at the present moment for action on their part.

PRISONS (IRELAND) — ASSAULT ON WARDER M'CONNELL IN MOUNTJOY PRISON.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the facts connected with the assault committed on warder M'Connell in Mountjoy Prison on the 9th instant by two convicts; whether it is the fact, as stated in the public Press, that the warder's life was saved by the intervention of another convict named Tansey, who interfered to protect him; and, whether it is proposed to recognize Tansey's action in the matter by the remission of his sentence, or otherwise?

THE TRUCK ACTS—VIOLATION OF THEIR PROVISIONS.

MR. BARBOUR (Paisley) asked the Lord Advocate, If his attention has been called to The Paisley Daily Express of the 4th and 6th instant, in which are alleged what appear to be breaches of the Truck Acts, by the contractors for the improvement of the River Cart; if he has taken steps to ascertain the truth, or otherwise, of these statements; and, if true, what steps are being taken for the enforcement of the law?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON) (Bute) (who replied) said, the Lord Advocate's attention had been called to the matter, and an inquiry had been made. There was no doubt that proceedings such as those to which the Question referred constituted a distinct breach of the Truck Acts if done by an employer to whose business the Act applied; but the work in question did not fall within the present limited scope of the Acts, and it was, therefore, impossible to interfere.

POST OFFICE—PRIVATE AND OFFICIAL POST-CARDS.

MR. RANKIN (Herefordshire, Leominster) asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been called to an issue of white post cards supplied by Fullford, Printers, at King's Cross, for 6½d. per dozen; and, whether, if such a price is remunerative, he will consider the question of reducing the prices of the post cards supplied by the Post Office, which are respectively 7d. and 8d. per dozen for the yellow and white post cards?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The cards to which the hon. Member refers are not those issued by the Post Office, but are private post-cards, allowed, under certain conditions, to be stamped at Somerset House. I cannot say precisely how it is that the stationer named undertakes to sell these cards at so low a price; but possibly it may be because they bear an advertisement. As has been more than once explained to the House, the Post Office is not at present in a position to reduce the price of the official post-cards. I extremely regret to say that, as a matter of fact, the contract has yet some time to run.

INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT—COLLECTIONS AT LIVERPOOL, COLCHESTER, AND CORK.

MR. DEASY (Mayo, W.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When will appointments be made to collections of Inland Revenue now vacant at Liverpool, Colchester, and Cork; and, will the third class Collectors of Inland Revenue, whose promotions have been deferred by the non-filling of these vacancies, be compensated for their monetary loss in not receiving their promotions?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.), in reply, said, that appointments had been made to collections of Inland Revenue at Liverpool, Colchester, and Cork. The third-class Collectors of Inland Revenue, whose promotions had been deferred by the non-filling of those vacancies, will not be compensated for their monetary loss in not receiving their promotions.

FRANCE—THE PARIS EXHIBITION IN 1889.

Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the statement that has appeared in the newspapers is correct, that Her Majesty's Government has declined to take part officially in the French Exhibition of 1889; and, whether, if the statement be correct, it is intended that henceforward Her Majesty's Government shall take no official part in any Foreign Exhibitions, or that there are special grounds for the refusal in this particular case?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I informed the House last Thursday that Her Majesty's Government has declined to take part officially in the French Exhibition of 1889. No such inference as the hon. Member suggests is to be drawn from that fact. In the present case, the date of the proposed Exhibition has been fixed so as to synchronize with the Centenary of, and to commemorate, the French Revolution. It does not appear to Her Majesty's Government appropriate to join officially in celebrating political events in a foreign country, where differences of opinion exist regarding them.

ADMIRALTY—POLICE FINE ON A NAVAL LIEUTENANT.

Mr. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the fact that a Naval Lieutenant has been fined in a Portsmouth Police Court for a common assault; and, what steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take in the matter?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): A Naval Lieutenant has been fined for a common assault. It appears that when out riding he came into collision with a cart, and in a moment of irritation hit the driver with his riding whip. The officer apologized for the transaction, and has been fined; and the Commander-in-Chief has expressed his disapproval of his conduct. I do not propose to take any further action in the matter.

ARMY (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT) — CAPTAIN HORTON, INSPECTOR OF SADDLERY AT WOOLWICH.

COLONEL HUGHES · HALLETT (Rochester) asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether Captain Horton, Riding Master of the 4th Dragoon Guards, who has just been appointed Inspector of Saddlery at Woolwich, is still on the active list of his regiment; and, whether, as his service is only 26 years, 315 days, or thereabouts, he is entitled, under Article 92 of Royal Warrant of 31st December, 1886, to retirement and full pension of his rank, having attained neither the required age nor length of service?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter): Captain Horton is at present temporarily employed as Inspector of Saddlery, and is still on the active list of his regiment. Captain Horton will be entitled to retire on the pension earned by 20 years' service in November next.

TITHES—DISTRRAINT FOR NON-PAYMENT, SHINFORD, BERKS.

SIR THOMAS GROVE (Wilts, Wilton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the fact, as reported in The Mark Lane Express of 9th May, that a distraint for tithes was carried out, on Monday 2nd instant, at Shinford, Berks, by order of the Dean and Chapter of Hereford, on property belonging to the Reverend B. Body, of Eldon House, Reading, and that, in consequence of a large cattle fair being held on the same day in the immediate neighbourhood, a rick of hay, valued at £70, was sold for £51, to the great loss of Mr. Body; whether it is lawful to distrain for tithe, as in this case, on the Monday, the notice for such distraint having only been given, by advertisement in the local newspapers, on the Saturday previous; and, whether, the notice being one only of one day, the distraint is invalid?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: The Secretary of State is in communication with the Dean and Chapter as to the facts quoted; but as yet there has not been time to receive a reply. The Secretary of State must decline to give an opinion as to the legality of the proceedings. If the person distrained upon feels aggrieved, he has his remedy at law.

CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN—H.R.H. THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, in pursuance of the arrangements made in respect of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, it is also contemplated that His Royal Highness the Commander in Chief of the Mediterranean Fleet, the Duke of Edinburgh, shall receive leave of absence from his post in order to be present at Her Majesty's Jubilee; whether there is any precedent for the Commander in Chief of this Fleet being allowed to come on leave; whether any steps will be taken to show the exceptional nature of the proposed action in this case; and, for how long a period leave will be granted?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord George Hamilton) (Middlesex, Ealing): I have given leave to His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh to come home and be present at Her Majesty's Jubilee, and arrangements have been made to carry out that object. The arrangement is in accordance with precedent; and the exceptional nature of the occasion so speaks for itself as to render it unnecessary to issue any special order on the subject. The Duke will be absent from his command about 10 days.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Will the noble Lord be kind enough to say whether the Duke's pay and emoluments are to go on?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—RETIRED SERGEANTS OF VOLUNTEERS.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended that Sergeants of Volunteers, if recommended by their Commanding Officers, should, on retirement after 10 years' service, be permitted to retain their rank and wear their uniform; and, if so, when an official communication to this effect will be made to officers commanding Volunteer Corps?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. Stanhope) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): There will appear in the new edition of Volunteer Regulations, which is now being printed, a Rule authorizing sergeants of Volunteers retiring after 10 years' service, if specially recommended by their Commanding Officers, to retain their rank and wear their sergeants' uniform, with the distinguishing badge which denotes honorary members of the Force.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—MIS-CARRIAGE OF SUMMONSES.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) (for Sir Thomas Esmonde) (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Postmaster General, How it came about that all the summonses to witnesses for the defence in the recent case between Mr. Hazley, the Postmaster of Blackrock, and Mr. Little, which were detained in the Blackrock Post Office, managed to slip into the same newspaper; and, if the newspaper was delivered in the ordinary course of post; and, if so, what is the explanation of the mistake not being discovered in time?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Raikes) (Cambridge University): In answer to the hon. Baronet's further Question, I have to explain that all the subpoenas were in one envelope. The newspaper into which the letter containing them slipped was delivered at its address in the ordinary course on the 14th of April. The letter, however, was not given back from that address till the 16th.

EGYPT — THE NEGOTIATIONS — EVACUATION BY THE BRITISH.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that an agreement has been come to with the Porte as to the date of the evacuation of Egypt by the British?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir James Fergusson) (Manchester, N.E.): I can give the hon. Member no other answer than that which I gave him on Friday, when he asked the same Question without Notice.

WAR OFFICE—SKILLED AND ORDINARY WORKMEN AT ENFIELD.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT (Rochester) asked the Secretary of State for War, The number of skilled workmen employed at Enfield, as compared with the number of ordinary labourers, and the relative wages received by each class?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: There are 1,284 skilled workmen employed at the Royal Small Arms Factory at Enfield, as compared with 803 ordinary labourers. The wages of the former vary from 5½d. to 1s. per hour; those of the latter from 4½d. to 9d.

POOR LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)—SALARIES OF POOR LAW OFFICERS.

Mr. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether medical and other officers appointed by Boards of Guardians are officers for life, and whether the salaries paid to them annually are unalterable, except with the consent of such officers, however greatly their duties may be diminished; whether he is aware that in consequence of the great decrease in the number of paupers (amounting in some cases to about one-half) during the last few years, many of those officers are now receiving salaries out of all proportion to the duties they have to perform; and, whether he would be willing to suggest that the Royal Commission on the Civil Service should extend their inquiries to the question of the Salaries of Poor Law Officers; or whether he will, by a clause in the forthcoming County Government Bill or by some other means, empower Boards of Guardians to regulate the salaries of their officers according to the duties required of them?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): District medical officers and relieving officers are, speaking generally, appointed for life, subject, of course, to the proper performance of their duties, and their salaries cannot be reduced without their consent. It is not the case that there has been, on the whole, "a great decrease in the number of paupers during the last few years," although, no doubt, in particular instances this has been so. Neither is it the case, in my opinion, that many of these officers are receiving salaries "out of proportion" to the duties they have to perform. I could not undertake to suggest that the Royal Commission on the Civil Service should extend their inquiries to the salaries of Poor Law officers, as this would be entirely beyond the scope of their labours; but the question of the powers which should be possessed by Boards of Guardians with respect to their officers will receive consideration in connection with the County Government Bill.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE TELEGRAPH OFFICE, DUBLIN.

Mr. M'CARTAN (Down, S.) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is aware that five first-class appointments in the Telegraph Office, Dublin, which were sanctioned by the Treasury several months ago, have not yet been made; whether four similar appointments, caused by vacancies in same office, have yet been carried out; and, whether, considering the delay in declaring the appointments, the clerks promoted will receive "back pay" from the date on which the appointments were sanctioned by the Treasury?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): I am aware that the appointments to which the hon. Member refers have not yet been filled; but I hope now to be able to fill them shortly. Whether the persons upon whom they may be conferred can be allowed to draw the salaries of their new posts from a date anterior to that on which they enter on the duties shall be considered.

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.

Mr. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in consideration of the shortness of the Recess at Easter, the Government will inform the House as to the date and probable duration of the adjournment at Whitsuntide?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Sir, the Government have felt some hesitation in deciding on the proposals to be made to the House as to a Whitsuntide Recess, as, although the holiday at Easter was a very short one, it must be admitted that the condition of Public Business, taken alone, would not warrant the Government in proposing a long adjournment next week; but having regard to the fact that the House has been sitting almost without a break for nearly four months, and the physical exhaustion which incessant and prolonged attendance has produced, not only in Members, but in the officers of the House, we have come to the conclusion that it will probably conduce to the better conduct of Business if we adjourn on Tuesday afternoon, the 24th, after a Morning Sitting, until Monday, the 6th of June; and I may venture to express the confident hope that before the adjournment substantial progress will be made with the urgent Business which is, or will be brought, under the consideration of the House.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne) asked whether the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill would be taken next week?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I prefer to mention that somewhat later.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—CONVOCATION OF THE PROVINCE OF CANTERBURY.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the following Resolution, said to have been unanimously passed by the Upper House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, and to the debate thereon, reported in The Times of the 11th May—

"That the President be requested to apply for the assenting license of the Crown for making a canon to enlarge and re-arrange the representation of the clergy of the Province of Canterbury in Convocation, in conformity with the annexed table. The table is to consist of four columns, detailing respectively the dioceses, the archdeaconries, the number of proctors at present, and the number proposed," and to the statement of the proposer of the Resolution that it—

"Was adopted in order to avoid the interference of a secular Parliament:"

whether it is true, as stated in the course of debate, that there is no precedent for the course proposed; and, whether Government, before granting the application, or assenting to any other course calculated or intended to impair or question the supremacy of Parliament, will give this House an opportunity of considering the subject?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I have had my attention called to the Resolution to which the hon. and learned Member refers; but, up to the present time, no application of the nature involved in the proposition referred to has been made to the Crown. If it is made, it will receive the serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government; and no course will be taken by the Government which will impair or question the authority of Parliament, as defined and laid down by Statute.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE OATHS BILL.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What course the Government propose to take in respect to a Bill to amend the Law as to Oaths now standing for second reading; and, whether the objects proposed to be attained under the said Bill are not already, to a great extent, provided for by Statute?

THE FIRST LORD (MR. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Her Majesty's Government, without denying that there are points in the Oaths Bill which deserve the consideration of Parliament, are unable to concur with the Bill in its present form. The objects proposed to be obtained in the Bill introduced are, to a great extent, provided by the Evidence Amendment Act, 1869, which enables a witness who objects to take the oath, or a person upon whose conscience the oath is not binding, to give evidence, after making a declaration in the words stated in the Statute. So far as witnesses are concerned, there is no necessity, as the Government are advised, for the Bill.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the Act of 1869 did not apply to jurors at all; that many jurors were escaping from duty, rightly or wrongly, by professing to be persons without religious belief; that the Act of 1869 did not affect any case in which barristers, solicitors, magistrates, or other persons were required to take the oath of allegiance, or any of the cases of promissory oaths in any of these classes.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not able to answer the hon. Gentleman on a question of law. If he desires to have an answer given perhaps he will be so good as to put the Question on the Paper.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, his only object was to direct the attention of the First Lord of the Treasury to these classes. He did not desire an answer.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE FLINTSHIRE MAGISTRACY.

MR. D. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.) (for Sir THOMAS ESMONDE) (Dublin Co., S.) asked the First Lord of the Treasury,

If the Lord Chancellor will communicate with the Lord Lieutenant of Flintshire, with a view to ascertaining whether there are any Nonconformists in the county qualified for the magistracy; and, if it be found upon inquiry that there are, whether the Lord Chancellor will cause the necessary steps to be taken to place them upon the Bench?

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) asked the right hon. Gentleman, whether he was aware that the Members for the county and borough of Flint, one of whom is a Nonconformist, are qualified to act, and, as a matter of fact, do act, as magistrates for counties other than the County of Flint, and whether there is any valid reason for their exclusion from the Bench of the county which they represent in Parliament?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster), in reply, said, he was not aware of the facts which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had stated, as he (Mr. W. H. Smith) was not intimately acquainted with the List of the Magistracy of the United Kingdom. As to the Question of the hon. Baronet, the Lord Chancellor saw no reason to doubt that the Lord Lieutenant of Flintshire had arranged to recommend those Gentlemen whom he considered to be most suited to the Magisterial Bench in each district, having regard to all the circumstances of each case; and he was not aware that any circumstances had arisen which called for his interference.

SOUTH AFRICA—ZULULAND.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): May I ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true, as stated in several newspapers, that the British Government have annexed Zululand to the Crown; and, if that is so, whether this has been done with the sanction of the Zulu nation; and, also, whether it is customary or right, in the case of such vast territories, to annex them without the consent of Parliament?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): I can but refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer which I gave a few nights ago, in which I stated that Sovereignty had been proclaimed over Zululand, and that the Zulus had assented.

Mr. D. Sullivan

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Will the right hon. Gentleman state what steps were taken to discover the views of the Zulus?

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: Steps were taken by informing the Zulus what was going to be done.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether he will give the House an early opportunity of expressing its opinion upon this most important action of the Government?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): There will, I think, be an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the Colonial Vote.

MR. LABOUCHERE: When?

MR. W. H. SMITH: That depends on the progress of Public Business.

RAILWAY RATES BILL.

In reply to Mr. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby),

THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth) said, that this Bill would be reprinted, and would be in the hands of Members shortly.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.

In reply to Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.),

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster) said, he hoped the Bill would be reached to-night. If not reached to-night, he was not able to say when it would be taken.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,958,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Provisions, Forage, Fuel, Transport and other Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1888."

COLONEL DUNCAN (Finsbury, Holborn): It will be in the recollection of the Committee that the Army Estimates were under consideration some days ago, and that certain Votes were taken up to the small hours of the morning, when, in consequence of an appeal that was made to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), he offered to give a more general discussion upon this Vote than it was possible to take upon the Votes as they were submitted to the Committee on the first night. I trust that in any step I am about to take I shall not abuse the privilege which the right hon. Gentleman was kind enough to grant to the Committee. There are, however, two points to which I specially desire to direct the attention of the Committee, and they are connected with the paymasters and the quartermasters of the Army. With regard to the paymasters, I wish to remind the Committee that system of appointing these officers has been frequently changed, and that the effect of these constant changes has been very prejudicial to the position and interests of the officers employed in the Army Pay Department, who complain that they have not been treated with the same consideration which has been extended to the members of other Departments of the Army. For instance, while the officers of the Commissariat and the Ordnance Store Department are always certain of obtaining the rank of lieutenant colonel, after having reached the rank of major in the course of four or five years' further service, that privilege is denied to the officers of the Army Pay Department. A very small number of officers connected with that Department succeed in obtaining the rank of lieutenant colonel, even although they may have been employed in active service in the field, and I need scarcely say that it is extremely mortifying to an officer who has been a combatant to see a non-combatant promoted over his head. I trust the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) will see that the very moderate appeal which the officers of the Army Pay Department make shall receive a favourable consideration. I have not sprung this question suddenly upon the Committee, seeing that nearly a year ago I stated the grievances of this body of officers. I may point out that they are admirable officers, and that their branches of the Service is working as well as any other in the Army. I therefore trust that their grievances and claims will receive some consideration. There is a special reason for bringing the matter before the House this year. Under the recent Warrant it has been decided that for 1887 no step on retirement shall be given, so that if the officers of the Army Pay Department do not get the privilege enjoyed by the Commissariat and Ordnance Store Departments this year, they will still remain in the rank they now hold, although, in point of actual service, they will be senior to other officers who may be promoted. There are one or two other points in connection with this Department which are worthy of the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. It is a matter to be regretted that the Department has no representative in the War Office. All the other Departments of the Army have some representation among the permanent officials of the Government. The great strides which have been made in connection with the Commissariat and the Ordnance Store Department have been in the main due to the fact that those Departments have had representation at the War Office. There is no such representation in regard to the Army Pay Department, and I therefore appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State to take into his careful consideration the propriety of having some link, so to speak, at the War Office between himself and this large and important body of officers. Passing from that Department, I come now to an entirely different matter—namely, the Quartermasters' Department. I have myself, on more than one occasion, brought the grievances of the quartermasters before the House, and I believe that their case has been frequently commented upon in this House; but I found that, on the whole, the opinion of the War Office has been that the grievances complained of are not very great. Nevertheless, the Secretary of State consented to the appointment of a Departmental Committee, and the result of the inquiry of that Committee has been to prove that there really is a case, because additional advantages, to a considerable extent, have been given to the Department; although, in my opinion, the concessions which have been made have not covered all the ground which ought to have been covered. It must always be borne in mind that the Army of this country is enlisted on the voluntary principle, and, therefore, that it is desirable to give proper inducements to the men who join the Army. At present, the only temptation you offer is deferred pay at the end of service, and the dreary prospect of passing into the Reserve, which really is no better than passing into the workhouse. The men who are passed into the Reserve find great difficulty in obtaining employment; and I see from the workhouse returns that a very large proportion of the men belonging to the Army Reserve have been compelled to become paupers. If your desire is to induce a better class of men to enter the Army, I am afraid that you will not accomplish your object by treating the men as you do at present. You must certainly make the inducements and temptations to enter the Army far greater than they are now. Let me call attention to the position of the quartermasters. They have essentially sprung from the ranks, and is their treatment so favourable as to afford a temptation to other men to enter the Army? How are they treated? I am sorry to say that they are treated differently from any other officers who may be promoted from the ranks, and that they are placed at great disadvantage. These quartermasters get commissions so late in life, that when the time comes for compulsory retirement there are two or three years' service wanting to entitle them to the maximum pension of £200 a-year, and for each year's time they are short they are mulcted £10. If, on the other hand, a man commenced to act as quartermaster in comparative youth or middle age, when he reaches the maximum of service to entitle him to a pension, and consents to serve for an extra number of years, he is unable to add to the amount of his pension at all. Surely, if it is right to mulct a man £10 a-year from his pension for every year of service that he is short, when the War Office retains a man in the same position beyond the time which would entitle him to the maximum pension, he ought to receive an addition of £10 every year. Unless a man finds that he has a prospect of increasing his pension by staying he will undoubtedly leave the Service, and the country will not only have to pay the maximum pension of £200 a-year, but will have to pay the man who takes the place of the officer who retires upon his pension. I believe that if a different principle were adopted the sum saved to the country would be very large indeed; and, therefore, apart from the question of justice, I make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War on the lower question of economy to do something to make the conditions of service in regard to the quartermasters of the Army better than they are now. They are excellent men, who represent what I may call the cream of the Service. In an ordinary case, when an officer has risen from the ranks he is well able to look after himself, but these men require to be treated with special tenderness and gentleness. I therefore hope the Secretary of State, taking into consideration the value of their services, and the justice of their demand, will consent to do something in their behalf. I have only one word more to say, and it has reference to the Royal Horse Artillery. The position of that branch of the Service has been before the country now for a long time, and it is understood that a considerable reduction in the force of the Royal Horse Artillery has been decided upon. I accept that decision, and will say nothing about it in any controversial spirit. There were, however, circumstances which occurred during the past year which led to my being to some extent the historian of that corps, to which for 30 years I belonged. I had, therefore, special opportunities of becoming acquainted with the bitterness of the feeling which has been occasioned by the decision of the War Office. I could recite stories of the gallantry of this branch of the Service which would make the eyes of hon. Members glisten and their cheeks glow. I am satisfied that those who are serving in the ranks to-day would emulate the deeds of those who went before them. I will, however, on this occasion do no more than express my most deep regret that the country is likely to lose the services of any portion of this most distinguished Corps. They can never be re-created with their old prestige.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I do not propose to follow the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down; but I desire to draw the attention of the Committee for a few minutes to a question which is very germane to the Vote now under the consideration of the Committee—namely, the question of the rations supplied to the British Army. I have already had the honour of bringing that matter two or three times before the House. On the last occasion, the Vote was not brought on until 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, and I am afraid that my remarks did not make any great impression upon those to whom they were directed—at any rate, the matter has not received that consideration which I think it is entitled to. Unfortunately, the frequent changes which have taken place in the Departmental Chiefs must necessarily have made the consideration of any special question most irregular. The rapidity with which one Secretary of State for War has succeeded another has rendered it difficult to bring the mind of the Head of the Department to questions of this nature. I may say that the question was brought under the consideration of the War Office some years ago, and General Peel presided over a Committee appointed to inquire into the matter. The Committee were of opinion that something ought to be done, and that better rations ought to be provided. But General Peel recommended that, instead of giving better rations, the soldier should get a little more pay. There is now a strong and growing feeling, especially in certain medical quarters, that the rations supplied to a soldier are too small. The surgeons of the Army Medical Department have reported that the soldier's ration of $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of meat is certainly too small for the support of his constitution. He certainly receives $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of meat; but if any hon. Member would go to the barracks and see how the rations are served up, he would find that those $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of meat are boiled down to a very small bulk indeed, so that in the end the soldier gets very little more than four or five ounces, after the meat has been cooked. Then, again, the soldier practically gets all his rations at one meal—namely, at dinner; he receives scarcely anything at all in the morning or in the evening. The consequence is, that when he goes out in the evening he gets a little liquor; the drink—operating upon an empty stomach—produces a very bad effect indeed. Although the question is one of importance concerning the regular soldier, it is of still greater importance when we have to deal with the case of the recruit. The recruit is generally a growing boy, often a weak, weedy boy, who is called upon to do a considerable amount of work of an intricate and complicated character. He has his drill to learn and a large amount of work to do, and he is certainly not well fed. He has to expend a considerable portion of his pay in buying extra food—such as milk, butter, bread, and cheese, which he finds it necessary to obtain in order to enable him to carry on the work he has to do. It may be said that so long as he has the money why should he not spend it in food; but in the case of a young recruit, he is open to very strong temptation to spend it in amusement. If he does, the result is, that he gets an insufficient amount of food; and we know very well that there are a far larger number of diseases prevalent in the Army than there ought to be. Hon. Members have frequently referred to free rations. Now, free rations are an entire delusion, a snare, and almost a swindle. A recruit is told when he joins the Army that he will receive free rations; but those free rations consist simply of $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of meat, a little coffee, and some bread. He has to provide himself with milk, with butter, cheese, and various other things, and finding himself disappointed in the idea which had been impressed upon him that he would get free rations, and that such free rations are purely ornamental, a very bad impression is produced upon him. I am afraid that the large number of the desertions we find reported in the Officers' Returns are very much due to the fact of the young soldier having found out that the delusive hopes held out to him have not been realized in actual practice. Considering the responsibilities of the career upon which he is entering and the probability of his losing his life in the service of his country, I think he is very badly paid, and that he ought to be provided with better and more ample rations. There are a large number of men engaged at the present moment all over the country in recruiting for the Service. I think it is very desirable that when they go down to the country districts they shall be able to describe the Service in such a way as to induce young fellows to come forward and to render the Service popular, so that we may get into the Army a better class of men. It will be said that recruiting is going on very favourably; but labour is now depressed, and there are a large number of men out of work. When employment becomes more abundant and more remunerative, the recruiting sergeant will have to compete with the labour market, and therefore it is highly essential that he should be able to offer an adequate temptation to the recruit. I will not weary the House by going into any other phase of the question. Any hon. Member, however, who looks at the Returns will be struck by the large increase of desertion that is now going on. Last year, out of a number of recruits, which amounted in round numbers to 35,000, nearly 5,500 deserted in the course of the same year, or 13·7 per cent. There was a much smaller number of desertions in 1883, showing that some cause must be at work which is rendering the Service less popular than it used to be. No doubt, a good many of these desertions are caused by a feeling of disappointment in the minds of young persons who have joined the Army at finding the inducements held out to them unrealized. I believe it is a fact which, in the great majority of cases, determines them to throw up the Service, and to retire into private life at all hazards. I think I have shown that if the regular soldier is sufficiently fed, at all events the recruit is not, and I would ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is not desirable to appoint some kind of Committee to consider the question. I do not want to lay down any hard and fast rules, or to define any machinery by which the matter is to be carried out. I have no doubt that it would involve a considerable additional expense; but I think it would be worth the money if the War Office could be induced to provide better rations, especially in substances of a fatty and farinaceous nature. At the present moment the soldier may get enough meat; but he certainly does not get enough of other articles—such as butter and cheese. Therefore, I ask for the appointment of a Committee, although whether such a Committee should be a Committee of this House, or of a departmental character, I do not presume to say.

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter): Perhaps it will be the most convenient course to dispose of the various questions one at a time as they arise in the course of the discussion of the Army Estimates rather than mix up different questions. The points raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Finsbury (Colonel Duncan) and the hon. Member for West Aberdeen (Dr. Farquharson) are altogether different, and must be replied to separately. The question of rations was brought forward last year by the hon. Member for West Aberdeen, who stated his case very fully, as he has done this evening, and was replied to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). One point raised by the hon. Member was, whether the matter was to be met by an increase of rations to the soldier, because if so it should be borne in mind, as was pointed out last year, that that would involve an addition of not less than £750,000 to the Army Estimates—too serious an increase to be decided upon rashly. The hon. Member will also know how reluctant the Government are to increase the Army Expenditure without the very strongest grounds indeed. Then comes another question, whether the ration is sufficient, and what the position of the soldier is as compared with what it was a few years ago. He now receives 1s. a-day, from which 5d. a-day is deducted for mess; but he also receives 5½d. a-day in addition, and 2d. a-day deferred pay. The position of the soldier now is much better in regard both to pay and rations than it was a few years ago, and as contrasted with foreign Armies, the British soldier receives more than double the rations of a Russian soldier, and more than any Continental soldier receives, the French soldier being the only one who can in any way approach to us. Including pay and rations, the British soldier now receives what is equal to 1s. 7½d. a-day, as against 1s. 3d. in 1866. It is apparent, therefore, that the position of the English soldier has been much improved of late years. I believe it would be of no advantage to the soldier to increase his rations by reducing his pay, because that would involve our contracting for special vegetables, and would curtail the liberty of choice which the soldier now has of purchasing certain articles of food for himself. The hon. Gentleman says that the Report of the Committee which sat in 1867 was favourable to an increase of rations; but as far as I am aware it is not the belief of medical men that our soldiers are at all underfed. As a matter of fact, I do believe that there are very few regiments in which there is anything like a full stoppage made, and that affords strong evidence that, so far as the officers are concerned, they consider that the soldier does get enough to eat. As to the appointment of a Committee, the War Office is already overpressed at the present moment with Committees of all sorts and sizes, and I am not prepared, therefore, to accede to the proposal off-hand, but I will undertake that the suggestions which have been made shall receive due consideration.

COLONEL HUGHES-HALLETT (Rochester): As we have permission upon this Vote to speak on general matters I should like to say a few words about the strength of the Army. Hon. Members are probably in possession of the General Annual Return handed in in October last, and the preliminary annual return of the Army this year. They are both of them most important documents, and they furnish hon. Members with some valuable information about the state of the Army and its effective strength. If hon. Members will take the trouble to examine the statistics contained in those documents I think they will arrive at a very good idea as to the state of the Army, and a comparison of its effective strength for the last 20 years, commencing with the 1st of January, 1866, and ending with the 1st of January, 1886. But while these Annual Returns furnish us with valuable and instructive facts they also afford a considerable amount of disappointment. As far as the numbers go it appears that the Army has been tolerably well kept up. On the 1st of January, 1866, the strength of the Army was 201,641, and on the 1st of January, 1886, it was 200,785; and it was 230,857 on the 1st of January this year. Although the increase, so far as the numbers go, is satisfactory, there seems to me to be something more required than the actual numbers—the age and physique of the men must also be considered. In 1873, the year when the short service system first came into operation, 46 per cent of the men who enlisted were under 25 years of age, and 31 per cent were over 30 years of age. In 1885, the last year for which the Returns are made up, the number of recruits under 25 years of age was 62 per cent, and there were only 14 per cent over 30 years of age. That is the natural result of what is called the "short service" system. It is no exaggeration to say that our ranks have been filled up with boy-soldiers. If scholarship tends to make a good soldier then certainly the Army has improved; but I contend that that is not so, and that something more than scholarship is needed. Scholarship does not make a soldier capable of hard work, of enduring hard knocks, and the fatigue of a campaign. It would appear from these Returns that the aim of the authorities has been to get recruits with a superior education rather than to pay attention to physique, robust health, personal strength, and power of endurance. This, no doubt, suits the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), but it is certainly not all that is required in the Army. What we want is men with broad chests, and a good sound constitution, who know how to use the weapons placed in their hands, and are capable of undergoing the effects of a hard campaign in a bad climate. For such purposes I would prefer a lad with a good physique, who cannot read and write, to a more delicate lad who knows how to make obtruse calculations in decimal fractions. No system of superior education will compensate for want of personal strength and power of endurance, although it looks very well in theory. In the year 1873 I find that we had 21,753 soldiers who could neither read nor write, and only 10,930 who had received what is called a superior education. In the year 1885 there were only 5,473 who could neither read nor write, and 148,723 of superior education. There is, however, this remarkable fact, that all this superior education does not make your soldier one whit better in regard to his conduct, for I find that in 1885 there were far more court-martial than in 1873. More than that, it is a very significant fact that desertion, casualties, and discharges have greatly increased under the short service system. In 1873 the net loss by desertion was 1,720, while in 1885 the net loss by desertion had increased to 2,975, or nearly double. In 1885 the loss by death was 2,585, and the number of those discharged and invalided was 3,581, 1,008 were discharged for bad conduct, 1,488 bought themselves out, and 3,531 retired on the completion of their service. Hon. Members who pay attention to this matter will find that the total withdrawal in that year was no less than 35,000, of whom only one-third went into the Army Reserve. Upon that basis it will be found that the whole loss in the regular ranks in the Army was something like 23,000 or 24,000—that is to say, one in seven of the men who enlisted. It appears to me that that is a most serious loss and a loss which, I maintain, the short service system is not able to stand. You may train a lad to a perfect appreciation of drill, discipline and order, you may train him to perform his duty thoroughly, and you may train him to a perfect appreciation of the honour of his corps and of his colours; but what is the use of all that if, after a few years, he is to be sent into the Reserve? In the Horse Artillery it takes four years to make an efficient driver, and yet in two years more that man is gone. It is almost sufficient to break the hearts of your non-commissioned officers to have to deal with a constant stream of raw recruits. The system which invites all the strongest young men in the country into the ranks of the Army, at the same time instilling into them the necessity of a superior education, and then draining them off in the course of a few years to earn their living as best they can, is a most pernicious system. It is a system not justified by results, and it is useless in practice. The fact is that Englishmen have no idea of originating military notions of their own. We copy most servilely the systems of other nations. But for the battles of Würth, Weissenberg, Gravelotte, and Sedan we should never have copied the German system. In the Crimean War we looked upon the French Army as the greatest military machine in the world, and we had our shakoes and uniforms cut according to the French Fashion. Then came the year 1870 and France, as a military nation, was found to be a sham. The German Army was then found to be the best, and the result was that our French military shakoes were thrown away to be replaced by the helmets of the Germans. We invariably copy foreign nations, and I believe if the Zulus had got the better of us in our campaign against them the uniform of the British soldier would have been a cincture of cows' tails. Hitherto we have made spasmodic efforts, which have not only been most costly but exceedingly cruel. In spite of what enthusiasts may say of the short service system the ranks of the Army Reserve will, in my opinion, decrease rather than increase, because a man knows that if he enters the Army Reserve it will not be easy for him to obtain employment. We cannot wonder that an employer of labour who has to keep factories and other means of employment at work should refuse to employ men from the Reserve. No man engaged in a great commercial operation will take a man who may be called away at any on moment, should a certain emergency arise; and as the hon. and gallant Member for the Holborn Division of Finsbury (Colonel Duncan) says, the result is that a large proportion of the paupers in many of the workhouses are men on the Reserve List. I am glad the hon. and gallant Member has called attention to that fact, because it reminds me that not long ago I had placed before me a list of 10 workhouses, and from that list I deduced this extraordinary fact—that 27 per cent of the paupers were on the Army Reserve List. The short service system is totally unsuited to this country. England is not like Germany where the Army is exclusively used for one purpose. We have to send our Army to Burmah, to Egypt, or to India, whereas the German Army is confined to Germany. Consequently, the conditions which apply to the German Army are not those which govern the British Army. It must be borne in mind that we have enormous possessions abroad which require the services of our Army to defend them. I know the advocates of the short service system say that we can retain our lads and wait until they grow; but there is no time for that, as any hon. Member may see if he takes the trouble to inspect the great military depôts, and visit the graveyards and the hospitals which are the natural consequence of the short service system. We are obliged to send our young soldiers to unhealthy climates, and they are sent home after a short service to die, or to become invalided and sent to the hospitals. That was not the character of the men who fought in the Peninsula War, the Crimean War, and in India before the Mutiny, and in the Mutiny itself. They were men of a very different stamp. Every man in the Army 30 years ago was worth two of the men of the present day, although I do not say this in disparagement of the young soldiers of to-day, who do their work bravely and well in the midst of a campaign in the face of the enemy. It is not their fault if, instead of being veterans, they are mere striplings; but it is our fault if we impose upon them tasks which they have not sufficient strength to perform, and which they are unable to perform with vigour and success. I maintain that an Army Corps of 100,000 men 30 years ago had the same fighting capacity as 200,000 men now. The argument derived from this is that the Army costs twice as much as it is worth. Every soldier now-a-days costs about £100 a-year. That is what the cost is when a man enters the Army as a recruit; but when he is sent into the Reserve he is worth at least £200 a-year. It will be said—"What limit can be found?" No Conservative on this side of the House has broader views on political and general matters than myself; but I am a Conservative in my belief that we had a far better Army, as regards the constitution of the Army, 30 years ago than we have at the present moment. I hope the nation will always have the greatest solicitude for the condition of the Army, and the system under which it is constituted. No one wishes to indulge in idle dreams of military competition with foreign nations; but the British nation has a right to demand that its Army shall be maintained as regards armament, training, and organization. While on the subject of the British soldier I may refer to an incident which happened not very long ago. A right hon. Gentleman, a Member of this House, made some very severe accusations against the British soldier. He accused him of acts of cruelty and inhumanity in the Soudan War, charging him with bayonetting the Soudanese as they lay wounded on the ground. To such charges as those I can give an emphatic contradiction, on evidence just as good as that on which the right hon. Gentleman spoke. Those who know what battle-fields are like on which the British soldier fights, when he is dealing with an Oriental or uncivilized enemy, will know that it is a very usual thing for an enemy to feign death until the Englishman approaches him, perhaps bringing water to relieve his thirst, or medical appliances, and to endeavour to shoot or stab him. These things were constantly done in the Soudan War, and is it to be wondered at that a man placed in such a position should protect himself by putting some such wounded wretch out of his misery, rather than run the risk of being killed himself? The well known Peace Party in this country is often fond of speaking bitterly against the Army when this country was not at war, but directly there is a sound of war in the air they are the very persons to press round the soldiers and praise them. I remember some lines which are ex post facto to this point; but I do not know who wrote them—

"When danger comes, and the foe is nigh,
'God and the soldier' is the cry;
When the enemy's beat and danger righted,
God is forgotten and the soldier slighted."

I would say that such accusations as those to which I have referred do not find favour with the great bulk of the British people.

Mr. FINLAY (Inverness, &c.): I desire to say a few words for the purpose of endorsing the appeal which has been made by the hon. and gallant Member for Finsbury (Colonel Duncan) on behalf of the quartermasters, and for some reform in the Army Pay Department. I do not wish to add anything to the statement which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has made, with very full knowledge of the subject except that my attention has been called to the matter, and I earnestly press it upon the consideration of the Government. I will only add one observation. We have heard a great deal of the necessity of supplying our soldiers with the best possible weapons; but, after all, our success in war must depend upon the men themselves; and, therefore, I trust that steps will be taken to gratify the legitimate ambition of a deserving class, and to remove the grievances of which they complain in order to show that we properly appreciate the services which have been rendered to the country.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I can assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Department over which I have the honour to preside is most anxious to remove any impression which may exist among any of those officers who are serving Her Majesty, that they will not do their best to remedy any grievance which may be proved to be a real grievance. The question of the Army Pay Department has been brought forward to-day by the hon. and gallant Member for Finsbury with extreme moderation, and, on a previous occasion, as he has reminded the Committee, he was kind enough to give way. I am sorry that I am unable to give a satisfactory answer to his appeal. The discussion has come upon me rather sooner than I expected; but I have given some attention to both of the points which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has raised, and what I am about to say will not, I trust, be altogether displeasing to him. The hon. and gallant Gentleman complains that the officers of the Army Pay Department after five years service do not obtain staff rank. He has pointed out that their position is a harsh one as contrasted with that of two other corps with which they compare themselves—namely, the Commissariat and the Ordnance Store Department, and he says that the officers complain that they are badly treated as compared with officers serving in other Departments. Now, in the first place, I should like to say that, at the present time, the War Office is engaged in re-modelling the Commissariat Department, and all questions of rank whether in one department or another must be treated as a whole—that is to say, that it is impossible to concede claims in one Department without considering the effect upon another Department. In regard to the case of the paymasters, I may say that the whole subject is now undergoing very careful consideration, and my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is now trying to deal with the subject in as comprehensive a manner as was possible. We admit to a certain extent the justice of the claim which my hon. and gallant Friend supports, and we shall be prepared, when the time comes, for promulgating our general views in respect to the paymasters to give some recognition to their claim to staff appointments. As to the quartermasters, their case was considered last year before the Royal Warrant was issued, and the Royal Warrant gives the views of the War Office of the time being upon the case of these officers; but I admit fully that there was one point which with regard to the quartermasters which we engaged to meet which has not been yet met. I stated the other day that it was intended to give a step in honorary rank to certain quartermasters; and I hope to be able in a few days to give the exact details of what we propose. Unfortunately I am not able to do so now. But before many days are over I believe I shall be able to state to the House exactly what we are able to do in regard to giving a step in honorary rank. I have now, I think, answered all the points of the hon. and gallant Member.

COLONEL DUNCAN: There is the pension.

MR. E. STANHOPE: As to the pension I fear that we do not see our way to dealing with that at present without opening the question in regard to other Departments; but the subject was considered at the time of the issuing of the Royal Warrant. With regard to the larger question of the reduction of the cost of the Army, I should be glad if my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Rochester (Colonel Hughes-Hallett) could show me any scheme which is calculated to reduce the cost of the Army without diminishing its efficiency. I can assure my hon. and gallant Friend that the War Office would not turn a deaf ear to any suggestion on that subject from whatever quarter of the House it may come. It would certainly receive the most careful attention of my hon. Friend and myself.

SIR WALTER BARTELOT (Sussex, North West): I should like to address a few words to the Committee, especially as this is the first opportunity I have had of congratulating my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War on the very clear and lucid Memorandum which he placed before us at the commencement of the Session. My right hon. Friend, like many other men in the high position he now occupies, has come into that position under somewhat difficult circumstances. Probably up to the time of his appointment he had hardly ever turned his attention to the great questions of the Army, and he now finds himself, at a very difficult time, called upon to consider most intricate and involved questions. I can only venture to express a hope that all those who are able to do so will give him that support which a man ought to receive who is endeavouring to do his duty under difficult and trying circumstances. My right hon. Friend has already made a speech in answer to the remarks which were made on the Memorandum he had placed on the Table of the House. In that speech my right hon. Friend complained, and rightly complained, of the present condition of affairs. He stated that if this House is prepared to vote the money, he should be prepared to place the Army in the most efficient condition possible. Well, Sir, it is that question of voting money which has been one of the main difficulties in regard to keeping up the efficiency of the Army. I will venture to say that it is one of the questions that deserve the very serious attention of the House. I see that an hon. Gentleman opposite takes a different view; but I do not think that even he would wish to see the Army in any condition except that of absolute efficiency. What we require, and what we really ought to have, is that every portion of the Army should be effective and efficient; and it has been proved to us beyond dispute that even the arms they have been called upon to fight with have not been what they ought to have been, and ought never to have been placed in the hands of the soldiers of this country. There are two things upon which mainly depend the efficiency of the Army. The first is Vote 1 of these Estimates, for the men; and the second is Vote 12, for warlike stores. Yet these are the two Votes which I say, unhesitatingly, are more manipulated for Party purposes than any other two Votes in the whole of the Army Estimates. It cannot be generally known that under our system of government such is the case. It used to be the case until quite lately, that when anything was wanted to be done—such as a reduction in the number of men or something or other in connection with the supply of stores—these two Votes were made to suffer. What was the effect? Why, that the whole calculations with regard to the Army were upset. You did not know exactly how far you could go, or how much the efficiency of the Army might be impaired. Half a million had to come off somewhere, and, accordingly, the number of the men was reduced. That is the way in which we have been accustomed to deal with that portion of the question. Then, again, as to stores; something more was to be reduced; and as the Vote for stores amounts to nearly £3,000,000, another £500,000 of reduction required must come off that, utterly regardless of the fact that the reduction was made for Party purposes, without any reference whatever to the efficiency of the Army. Everyone would admit that the efficiency of the Army was impaired; but there are only two Votes which can be easily manipulated; and, therefore, these two Votes, although they are more necessary than any others to keep up the efficiency of the Army, are the two which are invariably dealt with in this way. I have always thought, and I still think, that we ought to have some authority for the consideration of these questions. I do not know whether the Committee of this House, which is to inquire into the Army Estimates, will go into questions of this kind; but, as a great nation, the first thing we have to determine is what number of men we require, and how they are to be distributed—how many men we require for England, how many for Ireland, how many for India, and how many for the Colonies. Instead of this, we distribute our forces as exigencies arise, and then cut off a certain proportion here and there, the result of which is that we rarely have the number of men we ought to be able to rely upon in the event of an emergency. It is precisely the same with our supply of stores. Surely the first thing we ought to do is to decide what quantity of stores we require, and every Member of the House should be able to see and know what the requirements of the country are; to insist that the Government shall keep up those requirements, and to see that all the stores are maintained in a proper and efficient state. Let me ask one question. Suppose we were to go to war at once, should we be able to get all the powder we require, especially of a particular kind, which we get now from Germany? If Germany were at war should we be able to get it? Would this country get one atom of that powder if Germany were at war herself? That is a very serious consideration, and if I regard the recent speech of the Secretary of State for War aright, he wishes to know what he can depend upon Parliament to supply, in order that he may provide an adequate number of men and a sufficient supply of stores to provide the Army with all necessary appliances in the event of war. I have thought it right to say this, because I feel that it is a question upon which a great deal depends. We come here year after year, and we find that sometimes one thing is cut down and sometimes another is raised, while the real efficiency of the Army and of the stores is never considered at all. Then, again, there is another question. It is a question which has been already touched upon in the course of the discussion—namely, that of the Horse Artillery. I do not propose to enter into the question of the reduction of the Royal Horse Artillery at any length. I will only say that it is an arm which has done much good service in the past; and it is an arm which might be depended upon to do good service in the future. Further than that, it is an arm which cannot be got up at a moment's notice; but one in which the men require to be most carefully trained. I, therefore, venture to hope that my right hon. Friend will, if experience shows that he has made a mistake in reducing the number of the batteries of the Horse Artillery, have the boldness and courage to re-establish this branch of the Service. I understand that there are 14 batteries of Field Artillery which are to be converted into ammunition columns. In the case of war, I take it that we are to have two Army Corps. Surely my right hon. Friend cannot for a moment have regarded the efficiency of two Army Corps, if he seriously contemplates a project which would render 14 of the existing batteries deficient and unfit for the purposes for which they are now employed? The moment we go to war all the available horses, and, I presume, all the available men, are to be taken from those 14 batteries, and the Horse Artillery and the Field Artillery in the two Army Corps are to be made efficient by providing an additional train. If that is to be the case, there must, indeed, be a deficiency of Field Artillery for an active campaign. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will avail himself of the opportunity of explaining in what position we shall stand supposing that two Army Corps are called out for active service and are engaged in war. What will be the position of the Army at home and of the Army in India, as well as of the forces in the Colonies? This is a very serious question, and it is one upon which, so far, we have had no real elucidation whatever. Therefore, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give us a clear statement. There is another question which has been raised, and raised very strongly, in regard to the organization of the Artillery Force. We have a force of something like 33,000 men; and it has been suggested that this force should be divided into three branches—Horse Artillery, Field Batteries, and Garrison Artillery. Now, although it is suggested that the Horse Artillery and Field Batteries should go together, the two services are absolutely distinct. The Garrison Artillery stands, however, in a totally different position at the present moment. Any officer going into the Artillery would prefer the Horse Artillery or the Field Batteries to the Garrison Artillery, although it is the most scientific branch of the Army. Why is it that the officers dislike service with the Garrison Artillery? It is because they are put by themselves into small isolated forts all round the country, and they do not get the advantage of the promotion which other officers get who are serving in the field. It is, in fact, a place of the worst fortune, as it is called, and officers dislike it very much. Then, again, at the present day they are called upon to work enormous guns—guns which have cost very large sums of money, and the charges for which are also most expensive. I believe that one of the larger description of guns costs from £19,000 to £21,000, and the cost of each charge from £125 to £150. Some of the largest guns used in forts and the Navy are from 42 feet to 43 feet 8 inches long, and you require men to deal with them who have had a special training. You require men who have made them their study; and the officers who have specially studied this work and the construction of guns are the men who look forward to securing posts in your Arsenal at Woolwich, and your other manufacturing establishments. I understand that my right hon. Friend is going to increase the Garrison Artillery by 1,800 men—one half of which (900) are to be raised

this year. I know the question is a difficult one; but I say that it is a serious question, whether Garrison Artillery do not deserve a great deal more consideration than they appear to have had hitherto. It is in the hope that they will receive the consideration to which I think they are entitled, I have ventured to call the attention of my right hon. Friend to the matter. I come now to another question which is of great interest, and upon which we always receive valuable information from the hon. and gallant General my hon. Friend the Member for South Hampshire (General Sir Frederick Fitzwygram), and that is the case of the Cavalry. It has been asserted, and, I believe, rightly, that whenever we have a little war on hand, and desire to send out a regiment of Cavalry, we have to take men and horses from other Cavalry regiments in order to make up the requisite strength. In that respect our system differs materially from that of foreign nations, who always keep their Cavalry and Artillery up to a war footing. They know that services of Cavalry or of Artillery are of little or no value unless they are regularly kept up, and, therefore, they use every possible means of keeping up their strength and efficiency. That is what we ought to do; but I am sorry to say that hitherto we have not followed the example of our Continental neighbours. I believe that my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for South Hampshire maintains that every Cavalry regiment ought to have five squadrons, four to take into the field, and one to form a dépôt at home. I quite agree with him, and have so stated in previous debates. From the squadron maintained as a dépôt at home men can be drafted as necessity arises, in order to keep the regiment in the field in a constant state of efficiency. My hon. and gallant Friend is of opinion that every Cavalry regiment should always have four squadrons in an absolute state of efficiency. It is an arm of which we have always been proud, and which has rendered the country good service; but, as it is now kept up, there would be great difficulty, in the event of a war, in putting into the field a force of Cavalry which a great country like this ought always to have at its disposal. Then, again, as to the Reserves. You often experience a difficulty in getting the proper men belonging to a regiment when you wish to fill up vacancies. You ought to know where all your Reserve men are, and try them every year, in order to see whether they retain their efficiency, and so that you may not have mere Reserves on paper, but real Reserves, capable of being called out at any moment. I hope my right hon. Friend will go one step further. Let him get his First Army Corps together, and let him attach to it the Generals and officers who will have to command it in the field. We should then be able to see what it is that we have to depend upon. The men would know their officers, and the officers their Generals, and we should then be quite certain that we had one Army Corps—perhaps two—that was really efficient and ready to take the field at a moment's notice. I am quite sure that my right hon. Friend will understand the spirit in which I have made these remarks, and I hope they will commend themselves to his attention.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I am sure it cannot be held that our Army is a cheap Army; it is a very expensive Army indeed. In spending money on our Army, the great question is whether we get our money's worth for the great expenditure incurred. That depends very much upon organization. I am inclined to think, with the hon. and gallant Member for Rochester (Colonel Hughes-Hallett), that the Service has suffered, to some extent, from the short-service system. For service in India, and in other parts of the Empire, we need a larger proportion of long-service men. We have to maintain a large Army in India and all over the world, and we have gone too far in the direction of short service. When the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) was Secretary of State for War he took steps in the right direction, with a view of providing that the Army should be divided into long-service and short-service men; but the compromise we have now is one which means neither one thing nor the other. What I have risen for, however, has been to ask one or two questions in reference to the finance of the Army. Our position in regard to the Army is this—after deducting the cost of the Army in India, to which the fullest contribution is made by India, and also the contributions from the Colonies, we pay something near £19,000,000 for the Army we maintain for the defence of these Islands. For that purpose we have on paper something like 100,000 men, and the question is—are these men really effective? About 25,000 men are locked up in Ireland, and the remaining 75,000 are in England and Scotland. I believe there is much truth in what was said by the hon. and gallant Member for Rochester in regard to the large deductions which must be made before we can get at the real effective state of the Army. I believe that a large portion of it is not effective, and that there are a very large number both of soldiers and recruits who are not efficient in many ways. It appears to be necessary, in order to keep up an efficient force in India and the Colonies, to emasculate the battalions serving here; and I think it is an exaggeration to say that one-half of the men who serve in England and Scotland are efficient men fit to take the field. Therefore, when we are paying £18,000,000 or £19,000,000 for an extremely small Army, which exists to a great extent on paper only, and which would be greatly reduced before we could put it in the field. I must say that I am very uneasy. I have no wish to reduce the cost so far as the home defences are concerned. We have heard a great deal about the necessity for providing for the defence of our possessions in remote parts of the Empire; but I confess that we ought to feel much more interest in the defence of these Islands, and yet we possess but a very small, and altogether very insufficient Army. I ask whether the British taxpayer is fairly treated in regard to the financial arrangements? After deducting all the contributions we receive from the Colonies we have to pay £18,000,000 or £19,000,000 a-year for an emasculated Army, and what I want to ask is this. I believe that India pays the uttermost farthing that can be fairly charged upon her. I have never complained of that charge. I think it is quite right and proper seeing how dependent India is upon us for protection that she should pay every farthing of the cost which can be fairly charged upon her either directly or indirectly. But when we come to the Colonies we find a very different state of matters. We have in the Crown Colonies some 25,000 men who really represent a great deal more than that number seeing that they are the pick of the Army. But the contributions received towards the support of that Army amount to but a small fraction of the cost. Even that little is being constantly diminished. In all our questions with the Colonies we are only too apt to seek a settlement by putting a little heavier burden upon the shoulders of the British taxpayer. The total contributions towards the cost of these 25,000 men was no more last year than £139,000, which is but a very small fraction of the annual expenditure of the troops sent there. The Colonies are progressing in wealth and prosperity; they are making immense progress; but I do not find that their contributions towards the cost of their defence are increasing, on the contrary, there has been a considerable decrease in the contributions received from the Colonies this year. I want to know why that decrease has taken place? I think we may say that both in India and in this country something like one-half of our effective and actual revenue is spent on the Army and Navy, and on the defences of the country. But on the other hand, in respect of the Colonies only, an infinitesimal portion of the revenue is devoted to those purposes. I want to know why the contributions from the Colonies are so small, and why they have been reduced this year from what they were last year? Why should the West Indies pay nothing at all for their defence? Honduras used to pay £5,700 a-year, and that contribution has been reduced to £700 this year. I want to know why a colony like Natal—a most ambitious colony—always seeking for a larger territory, with a revenue of £800,000 a-year, a great part of which is derived from the British expenditure on the troops employed in the colony—I want to know why Natal only pays the infinitesimal small sum of £4,000 a-year for its defence, or something like one-half per cent on its revenue, while the British taxpayer has to pay fully 50 per cent upon his? Let me take the case of Ceylon; geographically, and for many purposes it is an outlying district of India. It is a rich country with a revenue of £1,200,000 a-year, but for purposes of military defence the Island of Ceylon pays only 3 per cent of its revenue; and I find that even that small payment has been considerably diminished this year, while India herself is required to pay a full contribution. Last year the contributions from the Colonies were reduced, and this year they have been still further reduced. Instead of paying 50 per cent like India why should Ceylon be only called upon to pay 3 per cent of her revenue? In these days of depression, I think we ought to look to the interests of the British taxpayer, as well as to those of the rest of the British Empire; and I contend that the contributions of the Colonies are not adequate, and are not on a fair scale compared with the contributions of this country. I will only repeat, before I sit down, that I think something ought to be done to establish a more efficient long-service system for the employment of the Army in India and the Colonies. The noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) went considerable lengths in that direction; and I hope that, after what has been said by the hon. and gallant Member for Rochester and others, the Secretary of State for War will be inclined to go further in the same direction.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): I perfectly agree with what has fallen from the Members who have already spoken in regard to the organization and administration of the Army. I think, however, the Committee should understand that we do not make these observations from any Party or personal point of view, either in reference to any particular Secretary of State for War, or any other official. The right hon. Gentleman who now fills that high position has made a first attempt to put things in a practical way in the Memorandum which has been laid before the House. He says—

“The success of the Prussian organization in 1870 for the first time drew the attention of this country to the question of the localization of our forces in peace time, and to the means of mobilizing them with rapidity when war was anticipated; and accordingly, in 1874, a plan for the localization of the forces was worked out and adopted, followed shortly afterwards by one for the mobilization of the Army.”

That was in 1870. The Memorandum goes on to say, a little further on—

“This scheme of mobilization was very carefully devised; but it had the serious defect of aiming too high. It assumed, as its starting point, that the whole of the Militia, as well as the Regular Army, was available for mobilization; and it passed over the fact that the strength of our Cavalry, Artillery, and the other branches of the Service, was much below what it should have been, to correspond to the strength of our Infantry. . . . The result was that the mobilization scheme of 1875 never had more than a paper existence.”

Here we are in 1887, and we are engaged in organizing now. Have we had no organization at all—have we only had an apparent organization, but no more real organization than we had in 1875—namely, a paper organization? We have a Secretary of State for War, a Commander-in-Chief, an Adjutant General, and a Quartermaster General; but in the years which have elapsed since 1875 we have had some five or six different Secretaries of State. Whether that is to the advantage of the Department I do not presume to say; but I do say this—that if any business in the commercial world was conducted on War Office principles, it would be in bankruptcy before many years were over. You are constantly saying in this House that you are anxious to cut down the Army expense. I am for nothing of the kind; but I am for efficiency; and every military man in the House of Commons will tell you that the country has not secured efficiency. I was glad when the late Chancellor of the Exchequer resigned, because I thought there would, at least, be a chance of drawing attention to the vast amount of money which is expended, and the very little which the Government gets for it. The noble Lord was not in favour of reducing the number of men; but of what I and other military men in this House wish—namely, that the money voted for the Army should be judiciously expended. If we possessed a proper system, the money would go a longer way; but under the existing want of system it will do nothing of the kind. You ought to have gone much further than you have done, and made many changes which you have not made. We soldiers feel that it is undesirable to have a civilian at the head of the Army, who, in the first place, can have no military knowledge, and who, if he had, would be unable to bring his knowledge to bear owing to the short time he remains in the Office. His time is occupied in learning his business, and in doing what he is told to do by his military advisers, and ever since 1870 we have had the same set of military advisers. The changes which have been made since have been altogether insufficient. Many of the Orders issued in recent years have been simply to put you "as you were." In ringing the changes between long and short service, I cannot but think the interests of the Army have suffered. The first thing we have to do is to see that the regiments, as they are now constituted, are properly organized and renumbered. At the present moment, there is a difficulty in getting the recruits required, and the reason is that you do not hold out sufficient temptations to induce young men to enter the Army. I should like to see more commissions given to men from the ranks, the position of the quartermasters improved, the uniforms simplified and cheapened, the officers' quarters furnished. Under the existing system, the Secretary of State for War, at the end of two or three years, is changed, and this is the real cause of much of the evil complained of. There are 30 or 40 things which require to be done; but as soon as some of them are done, a new Secretary of State is appointed, who undoes everything, and makes further changes. That, I say, is at the bottom of the whole thing. If the Secretary of State were to remain in Office for a considerable length of time, his views would become matured, and he would be able to introduce the changes which are necessary. In Dublin, you have a special command; in Scotland, you have none; and the consequence is that the Dublin staff are all tumbling over one another. To render the Army efficient a great number of things require to be gone into. For 16 years we have been doing nothing, and now, in the next six months, we hope to do all that we ought to have done in the last 16 years. I will not take up more of the time of the Committee; but I trust that the Committee will see that military men are desirous, not only of securing the efficiency of the Army, but of saving the money of the taxpayers.

GENERAL FRASER (Lambeth, N.): I will only take up the time of the Committee for a few minutes in asking permission to bring to the notice of the Committee a question of national importance—namely, the proposed reduction of Horse Artillery. The nation is led to believe that there are to be sufficient Horse Artillery batteries ready for the Army Corps to take the field; it should know that the nine attenuated batteries on peace strength when concentrated could only form sufficient for one Army Corps, leaving the other Army Corps with only 423 men and nine horses, and a deficiency of 277 men and 643 horses; and, further, that these batteries of one Army Corps will be in the air, without any substantial source from which to replenish. The reasons given for these reductions are various, and appear to be irreconcilable, and suggest "confusion worse confounded." Against these reductions proofs unanswered and unanswerable have been put forward. The Secretary of State for War has announced at different times that the object of the Government is "no longer to have too large a force of attenuated batteries, but to make those the country has effective and available for service;" yet, in answer to a Question, he stated that the batteries retained would be kept at attenuated peace strength. Further, the Secretary of State for War has announced that the first object in the reduction is to increase the number of Field Artillery guns, in which this country is specially deficient. Yet he also states, that by the reduction he creates an ammunition column, of which we are totally deficient. He has also said—"I must honestly say I should be very glad to have more field batteries;" yet, he declares that 14 batteries of Field Artillery—namely, 84 guns—are to be kept up in the time of peace, to be disarmed, broken up, and made into ammunition columns in time of war. Therefore, the scheme comes to this, that four batteries of Horse Artillery are to be used at once for "the provision of transport," and 14 field batteries are to be swept away for the same purpose in the event of war. The Secretary of State for War allows, with reference to a speech of the Adjutant General, that it will require 3,702 horses above the number estimated for this year to place the Royal Artillery and their ammunition columns for the two Army Corps on war strength. The Secretary of State for War has spoken of "the perplexity of the situation" with regard to the horse supply, and the especial difficulty with regard to Horse Artillery, and he used these words—

"I say there are no horses available in the country to man these Horse Artillery batteries in any short time, and to make them fit for active service."

His admission that the horse difficulty "engages his earnest attention," certainly gives the strongest reason against transferring to transport work these grand Horse Artillery horses, for which very inferior horses can any day be obtained. Every man interested in horses throughout the Kingdom knows that condition is everything. It was my duty, in 1882, to purchase several hundred horses. Artillery horses at £55 were difficult to obtain, and they were quite unfit, from want of condition, to go on service. With regard to the Horse Artillery men to fill up and to supply the vacancies caused by casualties, they are to be found in the highways and the byeways from the Reserve. Many men have taken to tramping, and have not been mustered or medically inspected for years, and have lost the Horse Artilleryman's art. There is no other resource. Without the reduction we have not one man or one horse too many. It is a fact that within the last few days batteries in the ordinary course of relief from one station to another in this country have been obliged to borrow horses to move the guns. The question is—How can the batteries be raised to war strength? The answer must be, either by drawing on other batteries in reserve, such as the four doomed batteries, still within call, or else from a large Horse Artillery Depôt, for the two Army Corps, which condition, an excellent authority states, was the recommendation of the Committee. Of this we now hear nothing. There is no reserve whatever of horses, and yet no battery could be safely sent into the field with some 70 horses new to their work; one inefficient horse may mean the loss of valuable lives, or of guns. Guns, as the Secretary of State for War remarks, would be useless without ammunition; also, it may be said, ammunition would be useless without guns. The question is—Which is the most easy to improvise, gun batteries or ammunition columns? In his Memorandum on the Estimates the Secretary of State for War shows that there is sufficient Field Artillery for the two

Army Corps without touching the Horse Artillery, if only provision is made for ammunition columns. Now, 14 effective field batteries are to be turned into ammunition columns in war time, a step equivalent to absolute reduction of them so far as the guns are concerned. The result of this scheme would be, that were the two Army Corps on emergency to be sent abroad, and were an invasion of this country attempted, we may be absolutely denuded of all regular Field Artillery. The Secretary of State for War has stated that it was intended to issue to the Volunteers field guns, which were to compensate for the loss of our guns of Regular Field Artillery. Is it still intended to carry out this part of a scheme? Has any arrangement been made for the instruction of the Volunteers in Artillery riding, driving, &c.? Surely England should maintain a sufficiency of Horse Artillery, on which India, which pays for so many of our batteries, might draw on sudden emergency. If the two Army Corps are raised above paper condition and have to go abroad, England will be left without a man or horse to recruit casualties either for these Army Corps or for India. Is it wise or prudent, at a time when every European power is arming to the teeth, to reduce one of the special branches of the British Army? Considering our responsibilities in the Mediterranean and the East, where Cavalry and Horse Artillery are of vital importance, are we right in reducing an arm which cannot be immediately strengthened or constructed without years of special training? The necessities of India appear to have been ignored—the reliefs even of the batteries there are not taken into account. Field Marshal Lord Napier of Magdala, in "another place," has expressed his opinion that the reduction of our more perfect armament, which has taken a long and careful training to bring to that perfection, is sure to be followed, at no distant time, by increased expenditure, if by no greater evil. It must be borne in mind that, in 1870, the Royal Artillery was decreased by 2,190 officers and men; that very year it was increased by 5,000. In 1881 there was a further reduction of 352 horses and 659 men and 42 guns. In 1882 there was a further reduction of two batteries of Horse Artillery, two of Field Artillery, and also of three Garrison batteries. Within the last four years the Indian Government represented that it might be obliged to call on England for a large number of horse and field batteries, which could not possibly have been supplied without almost denuding the whole of the home batteries. The distinguished General, spoken of by the Secretary of State for War as his military adviser, appears to have overlooked the necessity of mobility in Artillery, and to ignore entirely the value of Horse Artillery; if his advice is adhered to, in a very short time in a campaign there would be no Horse Artillery available. His depreciation of the value of the Horse Artillery as being armed with a very poor gun is not applicable, as a large proportion of the Field Artillery are at present also armed with the 9-pounder gun, though we are told these batteries will be armed with a superior gun and the Horse Artillery with "some sort of 10-pounder;" but these equipments are not in existence. He claims that our field batteries are armed with an admirable 13-pounder or the old pattern 16-pounder—a good but unwieldy gun—the fact being that there are only 13 batteries armed with the 13-pounder, and 15 batteries with the 16-pounder. I have received earnest representations from many of our most distinguished officers, who have organized and commanded Armies, protesting against the proposed reduction, and I feel confident that this House and the country in general support their views. We soldiers repudiate the idea just now put forward that there is an agitation on this subject likely to lead to indiscipline; we fully recognize the brilliant deeds and the discipline that have gained for the Royal Artillery a name that no taunt can touch and no disparagement discredit.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I think it will be for the convenience of the House that I should now say a few words in reply to the speeches which have already been made. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) has called attention to the contributions now being made by the Colonies towards the military expenditure of this country, and he named certain Colonies in which he thought the contributions, inadequate as they were, had been reduced. I wish to offer one or two words in answer to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman, because I am one of those who, looking at the cost of employing Her Majesty's troops for the defence of the Colonies, think that the Colonies themselves ought to be called upon to contribute fairly. First of all, the hon. Gentleman called attention to the case of Honduras.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: To the West Indies.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Honduras is one of them. In the case of Honduras the troops were being gradually withdrawn, and, accordingly, Her Majesty's Government had agreed to remit the Honduras contribution of £5,000. Hong Kong and the Straits Settlements and Ceylon have also slightly reduced their contribution; but that has been done at a time when they have been induced to vote an enormous sum for the defence of the coaling stations, or their own defence. Hong Kong has voted over £145,000, Ceylon £45,000, and the Straits Settlements a very large amount, for the purpose of putting Singapore in that position of defence in which we wish to see it. Therefore, I do not think that anyone could say that the Colonies have neglected the responsibility thrown upon them, or have failed in their duty. And now a word or two with respect to the speech of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lambeth (General Fraser) who has just sat down. So far from there being any desire, on my part, to make an attack on the Horse Artillery, I can assure my hon. and gallant Friend that I am one of those who joined with him in hearty recognition of the merits of that splendid force. The Horse Artillery has rendered magnificent service to the country, and should the occasion arrive I have no doubt they would render services equally great. Anyone who has seen the admirable pitch of training at which the force has arrived cannot fail to admire it, wherever they see it employed. Therefore, it is in no spirit of hostility to the Royal Horse Artillery that any of the proposed changes will be carried out. I speak as a Secretary of State for War who has only held that position for a few weeks. All that a Secretary of State for War can do, under such circumstances, in regard to any alteration in any part of the Service, is to ask for and receive the opinion of his military advisers, and having weighed their experience and their views they put forward, to arrive at the best conclusion he can form from the expression of opinion he receives from them. His duty is to look at the question from the broadest possible point of view. He is bound almost to utilize in full all the resources of the country, and there are two questions he is specially bound to ask himself. The first is whether the step he is about to take will increase or diminish the defensive or the offensive power of the country; and in this case the evidence before me proves, at any rate, to my satisfaction, that the proposed alteration will increase the defensive power of the country. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), whose speech I may say we were all glad to hear, after his long absence from the House, referred to the Garrison Artillery. Now, I may tell him that during the short time I have been in Office it has been my duty to devote a very large portion of my time to the consideration of that question. There is nothing more important than to maintain the Garrison Artillery in a state of efficiency. I know that up to a certain point the Artillery Volunteers can be relied upon in case of necessity, but that is not sufficient. In the scheme we are laying down we are utilizing to the full the services of the Volunteer Artillery; but it is impossible for them to devote sufficient time to training and the acquisition of that scientific knowledge which would alone enable them altogether to supersede the regular Garrison Artillery in case of invasion. It is, therefore, necessary that there should be a large increase made in our Garrison Artillery Force if we wish to put the defensive Force of the country upon a proper footing. I have put forward, in a Memorandum, which has been circulated to Members of Parliament, a hope that Parliament will be induced to sanction the creation of two new Army Corps of regular troops. Some people say that I am much too sanguine, and that the scheme is far too ambitious; but if that is the argument which is to be put forward it makes our case all the stronger, because, according to the evidence of military experts, when the scheme is carried out the present proposal which has been determined upon will enable us to provide two Army Corps, with an efficient force of Horse and Field Artillery, as well as with an efficient ammunition column which at present does not exist. Let me now refer to some of the objections which have been raised. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sussex was the first to refer to the ammunition column, and my hon. and gallant Friend who just sat down has pointed out that it will be weakening the Artillery to turn 14 batteries of Field Artillery into ammunition columns. I explained the other day that that is what we have already done. As at present we have no ammunition column; if it is necessary to send the Army abroad, we have practically to break up the field batteries. It is now proposed to establish ammunition columns solely for this purpose, that we may be able to send an Army Corps into the field in any sudden emergency without undue delay. If we are to have a little time, and to be supplied with the necessary funds for the purpose, I undertake to say we shall be able to send out an Army Corps, and at the same time to retain field batteries for effective service, either at home or wherever they may be wanted. My hon. and gallant Friend also called attention to the fact that the batteries of the First and Second Army Corps are not fully equipped, either with horses or men; and, he added, that if we were called upon to act in any sudden emergency we should experience great difficulty in fully manning these Corps. I admit that to the fullest extent. I can only say what I have already said, that if Parliament wishes to have these two Army Corps put upon a war footing, it must be prepared to supply the War Office both with men and money. On no other condition should we be able to carry out the work; but I do not think Parliament will refuse when it is asked to supply those means which are not refused in other countries. I may say that the steps we have taken, although they have met with the greatest hostility from my hon. and gallant Friend behind me, will greatly increase the fighting power of the Army, and will enable us to take the steps which have been advocated in this House year after year, but to carry out which nothing has hitherto been done. It is also intended to provide the nucleus of an Army Transport Corps in connection with every regiment in the two Army Corps, that being one of the prime necessities of the Army. All I can say as to the Commissariat Department is that it will be carefully inquired into, and I hope and believe that the inquiry will be made in the course of the current year. The object will be totally to re-organize the system so as to make it very much more efficient, from a fighting point of view, than it has ever been before. We hope to take other steps. We believe that even out of the present Estimates we shall be able to do a good deal towards putting the First Army Corps in a state of readiness, so that it may be able to take the field at a moment's notice. It must be remembered that our Army, after all, is a very small one, and that it is the duty of the War Office to so utilize it as to make every man in it of value, and every portion of it applied to the most effective purpose. That is what we really want—namely, to secure that every man in our small Army shall be applied to the most practicable and the most useful purpose possible—that every man shall be acquainted with the particular purpose to which he is to be applied. In carrying out this object, a heavy responsibility lies on the Secretary of State for War; but it is one from which I do not shrink, and one which I will endeavour to discharge to the utmost of my ability. I am quite certain that if any Secretary of State for War, on coming into Office, can satisfy Parliament that his object is to make our small Army useful for all the purposes for which it is intended, he will have no difficulty in inducing Parliament to supply him with the means.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): May I be permitted to say that I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman very much upon the course he has taken. It is, I believe, the first instance in which the Representatives of this House who are especially interested in military matters have been assembled upstairs in order that the Government might lay their proposals before them. Such a course will, I think, tend to shorten the debate in Committee, and to bring the views of hon. Members best qualified to form an opinion forcibly before the right hon. Gentleman. As far as the reduction of the Royal Horse Artillery is concerned, the essential points of which have been so ably laid before the Committee by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lambeth (General Fraser), I regret that the right hon. Gentleman should have announced his final determination to adhere to the decision at which he has already arrived. We had reason to believe that it was still open for consideration, and that, after a discussion here, the War Office might have been induced to come to another decision in the matter. The right hon. Gentleman told us, as we have been told before, that the opinion of his military advisers has strengthened him in making this reduction, although I believe there has been no step which has been more universally condemned by the whole military opinion of the country. But I think the right hon. Gentleman must have been altogether misinformed if he supposes that even at a moment when military officers have felt themselves professionally obliged to condemn the change about to be introduced, they will be induced to turn from the strict path of the lines laid down by military discipline, or to get up anything which may bear the slightest semblance of agitation against the scheme. I am one of those who have taken a humble part in pressing reasons and arguments against any reductions of the Royal Horse Artillery upon the right hon. Gentleman as strongly as possible. I have therefore been brought into contact with other general officers; and, I believe, the right hon. Gentleman is entirely misinformed as to their feeling, for I have seen nothing but the strongest indications of dissatisfaction. I am not going to repeat again the arguments which have been so strongly put by my hon. and gallant Friend opposite (General Fraser). He has made the question his special study, and I think he has acquitted himself in a way which reflects the utmost credit upon him. I believe that further argument on our side is needless; the question is well understood in the country, and our views have been endorsed by the public Press in every direction; and, therefore, the only persons who remain in favour of the scheme of the War Office are certain unnamed military officers, although who they are I have not been able to make out, after the most minute and careful inquiry. I am in possession of the opinion of all the officials of the Horse Guards and the War Office, although I will not name them or the offices they fill, and with the exception of one general officer who is understood to be the originator of the scheme, I have not been able to find a single individual, high or low, who is not prepared to express his strong condemnation of the step the War Office were about to take. The reason why I now speak on this subject is, that when the matter came under discussion half-an-hour ago, I was under the impression that the step had been finally taken, and in that case it would have been unnecessary to make any further allusion to it.

MR. E. STANHOPE: It has been taken.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN: I am extremely sorry to hear the right hon. Gentleman confirm my fears upon that point. But even if the decision should be reconsidered, I believe that at the eleventh hour it would not be an easy matter to call these batteries again into immediate existence. I want to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that he is now taking a step in the name of economy which, instead of being economical in its results, will lead, in my opinion, to the most extravagant and wasteful expenditure that can be devised. Supposing in 12 months it should be necessary to reinstate these batteries, I venture to say that the saving, which the right hon. Gentleman thinks would be effected would be exceeded four times in amount in the attempt to re-establish them, and that they would be re-assembled with a degree of efficiency so minimized that there could be no comparison between it and their present state of efficiency. I repeat that it is the most wasteful and extravagant proceeding I have ever heard of. The right hon. Gentleman tells us he is only following the precedent of foreign armies in preserving the Horse Artillery on a small footing at this time, and reducing the number of guns from six to four. But, in saying that, he is instituting an analogy which is utterly and entirely inapplicable in the case of our Army. In Austria, France, Germany, and Russia there is a well-constituted and efficient system of reserve for horses, extending over all parts of the country, and in the cases of Artillery there are numerous Reserves, amounting to thousands of men, perfectly trained and kept up in their exercises, so that on any emergency, they can be brought in to swell the batteries from four to six guns. In our system there is nothing resembling that. To talk of filling up these batteries with our Reserve Artillery men appears simply ridiculous to those who are acquainted with the matter. On going back to civil life, the men lose nearly all their riding and driving, which in the Horse Artillery has been raised to the position of a fine art. Therefore, I say, to talk of analogy in this respect between this and foreign countries, is a thing so ludicrous, that, as I ventured to say before, it approaches to something in the nature of a practical joke. I suppose we must consider that this matter is at an end; but we military Members, who are strongly impressed with the fatal nature of the step that is taken, have discharged our consciences; we have, at all events, the satisfaction of knowing that, with the exception of this shadowy individual, who has been referred to, we carry the whole country with us. Having said that and stated our views, I do not desire to go further in the matter, because I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I do not wish to embarrass him in the slightest degree, but, on the contrary, to give him every aid in the task which he has taken upon himself. The right hon. Gentleman already, during the short period he has been engaged at the War Office, has given us the assurance that he will equal, and even exceed the records of many of his Predecessors; and, therefore, it is not with any contentious feeling that I express my regret that he should have been led to take this step. Our protests have been made against a measure which, we are told, it is no longer in our power to reverse, but which we believe to be most mischievous. Having recently returned from abroad, and having had long experience of the military system of every nation of Europe and that of America also, it seems to me that, in view of the possibility of having to make a sudden demand for a large development of our military forces, either for the defence of our Indian possessions, or on account of contingences which might take place in Europe, this is the very worst moment that could have been chosen for taking this step. But I would beg to be allowed to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to that which I conceive to be the next important step to be taken. The hon. and gallant Member for the Fareham Division of Hants (Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram) is the man best qualified to speak on this question, and, therefore, I shall only touch upon it. It is no secret that the condition of our Cavalry, as regards their power of rapid expansion, is unsatisfactory; the officers and men of the force are undoubtedly all that can be desired; but as regards the power of expansion and the supply of horses, it is probably in a lower condition than it has been for years. I have long been the advocate of the foreign system, by which a sufficient supply of horses is obtainable. We have nothing amongst us approaching to that system. It is true that there is a skeleton dépôt for Cavalry at Canterbury, which, it appears, supplies the demands which arise in our Indian Service; but it is no exaggeration to say that if a sudden demand were made upon us, even such as was made in the Egyptian Campaign of 1882, to say nothing of any European contingency, which would, of course, be a much more serious matter, we could not at the present moment put three complete Cavalry regiments into the field; and to do that, it would be necessary to draw from every Cavalry regiment in the Service, so that you will have nothing approaching a Reserve behind it. I do not want to dilate on this subject longer, because the hon. and gallant Member for the Fareham Division of Hants, who has filled the post of Inspector of Cavalry for years, will deal with it, and I know that when he gets up we shall have a full supply of details. I will, therefore, in conclusion, beg the right hon. Gentleman early and earnestly to direct his attention to this matter. I say this with the desire to aid him in achieving a brilliant success; and I assure him that if he can succeed in putting our Cavalry on a footing of efficiency with the two other arms of the Service, he will have accomplished more in the direction of a most necessary and valuable work of Army reform than has been achieved during many years past.

SIR FREDERICK FITZ-WYGRAM (Hants, Fareham): The question of reduction of the Horse Artillery has been very fully discussed, and I do not propose to deal further with that subject. But I have another subject before me to which I desire to direct the attention of the Committee, and to which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) has alluded—namely, the absolute necessity which exists for increasing the number of trained men in garrisons for the service of our large new guns. That necessity arises from the great weight of modern guns and the machinery connected with them. In the old days, in case of siege, infantry were used for working guns; but that cannot be done at the present time with modern guns under existing circumstances. We have been told that these guns cannot be worked except by thoroughly trained men. My idea is that the Infantry regiments ought to be trained under a full course of instruction in the loading and management of garrison guns. The knowledge of this cannot, of course, be gained on the emergency, for, as the Committee will be aware, it takes a long time to teach men what they have to do. It would take a considerable time to put the men through the course. Now, there are two classes of instruction—first the laboratory course through which gunners have to go, and which can only be gone through at Woolwich. It embraces technical and scientific knowledge. That course I do not think adapted to Infantry regiments. The second class of instruction relates simply to the working of the guns when in position, and that course I believe may be thoroughly learned by Infantry regiments. I do not propose that the whole of the regiment should be taught, because there are in all regiments a number of stupid men who are incapable of being so instructed. There are, however, in all regiments a number of intelligent men fond of machinery; and I think if, say 15 per cent of the regiment were taught, the result would be in every way satisfactory. To effect this, I think three or four months, with two hours instruction a-day, would be necessary. It cannot be expected, however, that men would give up their time without payment, and I think that about 1*d.* a-day per man would be sufficient. Taking the number of men at 120 per battalion, this would cost, in round numbers, 10*s.* a-day, which, with a slight extra allowance to non-commissioned officers, would amount to £200 a-year; that sum, multiplied by 100, the number of the battalions, would make £20,000 for the year; and I believe that for this sum, by utilizing your

Sir Henry Havelock-Allan

Infantry soldiers in the way I have described, the Nation would have the advantage of possessing 10,000 men thoroughly and completely trained in the working of the guns which are now placed in our forts. I am aware that this scheme can only be carried out when these Infantry regiments are in fortified places; but I think, in due time, the whole of our Infantry regiments might pass through the course I have described. In the meantime, I may point out the whole cost of the arrangement would not fall at once upon the Exchequer. It is said, by way of objection to this proposal, in the first place, that the Infantry men would lose their practice when not in forts; but I think that might be avoided by the Secretary of State for War placing one large new gun at the head-quarters of each Infantry regiment. In the next place, it is said that there would not be time, in these days of short service, to put the men through the course; but I know something of the practice in Cavalry regiments, where numbers of the men are spared for various purposes, and I think that if the men of a Cavalry regiment can spare five hours a day in stables, it is only reasonable to believe that an Infantry regiment can spare 15 per cent of the men to be put through the course I have suggested. There is another subject cognate with this to which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War has slightly alluded to—namely, the value of Volunteer Artillery. At Portsmouth—and, I presume, also in the neighbourhood of our other fortifications—there are large and excellent corps of Volunteer Artillery, who only learn and practice with the old smooth-bore 64-pounder. It seems to me utterly absurd that they should be restricted to obsolete guns and obsolete practice when there are in our modern forts new guns, and when there are also Royal Artillery officers in the garrison who are perfectly able and willing to train the men in the use of these weapons. I admit there would be the cost of providing the ammunition for the practice, but that would not amount to a very large sum. Then there is another question connected with the Artillery which I wish to bring before the Committee. The Field Artillery are no doubt a most valuable branch of the Service; but less valuable, I believe, than they might be made. In the Field Artillery only a certain proportion of men are taught to ride and drive, whereas it seems to me that every man who joins should be put through a course of instruction in the riding and driving school. It seems to me absurd that, in a corps where there are waggons and horses, and all the means of instruction in these respects, there should be a single man less useful than he might be. Then there is the question of the Cavalry pioneers. In modern warfare, I believe Cavalry pioneers to be invaluable. The work of pioneering is hazardous, I know, but you will always find men ready for that in every regiment, and it is impossible to see the extent of mischief that may be done to the enemy by these men in the destruction of telegraph wires, railways, engines, bridges, and so on. We all know that, in the present day, wars are carried on at a great distance from the base, and, therefore, offers great facilities for the destructive operations of well-trained mounted pioneers. At present there are 16 pioneers in every Cavalry regiment; they are sent to Chatham for their training; the men come back well trained, undoubtedly—and I have nothing to say against the system in that respect—but when they return to the regiment they do not practice, and the reason of that is, that they get no extra pay for the work. You cannot get men to go out an hour a-day unless you give them some remuneration. I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to take this into consideration—to give 16 men in each regiment 1*d.* per day, say, in all, 2*s.* per day, £36 per year per regiment, which for 30 Cavalry regiments would give a cost to the State of £750 a-year. No doubt the Cavalry are very expensive; but it is not worth your while to render them less effective than they might be if this comparatively small sum of £750 a-year were expended upon them. The Army Estimates amount to £18,000,000 a-year, and it seems to me cheeseparing to hesitate to hand over these small sums for the purposes I have described. I know that many in high quarters attach great importance to numbers; but I value more than that the efficiency of each individual man. I say, reduce numbers if you will, but in the name of common sense give the money which will make the men you have as thoroughly and practically efficient as they can be. The hon. and gallant Member for South-East Durham (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) has appealed to me to make some observations on the subject of Cavalry re-organization. I dealt with that subject when the House was considering the Army Estimates at an earlier period in the Session, and I will not, therefore, repeat all that I said on that occasion. I believe that a re-organization of our Cavalry is absolutely necessary. All our Cavalry regiments are too weak for the purpose of war; we have far too large a number of units. I agree that the Cavalry regiments ought to consist of five squadrons at least—not the depôt squadrons which the hon. and gallant Member for South-East Durham spoke of, as existing at Canterbury, but five effective squadrons, four to go abroad in case of war, and one to be left at home. I know that remarks of this kind are distasteful; but it is our duty to point out to this House and to the Secretary of State for War that this plan is absolutely necessary for the efficiency of the Cavalry branch of the Service, and on the whole the most economical means of effecting improvement. What I ask, with regard to the Cavalry would, I believe, cost nothing to the country; and I believe also that the Indian Government would only be too glad if the Home Government would consent to the increase in the case of the Indian regiments, because they know that regiments of a certain strength are more effective and more economical than weaker regiments. Allusion has been made to the supply of horses which it is said we cannot get. With regard to that matter, the facts are very simple; the breeders will never rear more horses than the trade of the country requires. Horses are unlike boots and shoes, they cannot be kept in stock; and when they are produced they must be sold by the dealer at the price he can get for them. I have myself looked into this matter, and I may mention that the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (The Marquess of Hartington) placed me on a Committee some time ago, and the result of our investigation was to find that the same state of things which exist in England occurs in almost every country in the world—that is to say, there is, beyond the actual requirement of the trade of each country, no stock of horses fit for bit or bridle. I believe that something like 5,000 horses might be got in this country without much trouble; but when you have taken up the whole number in the hands of the dealers you would not be able to get the number which would be required in case of war. In the course of my inquiry, I was informed by the managers of the London General Omnibus Company that nothing would induce them to part with more than two per cent of their stock of horses. In short, I am of opinion that nothing you can do will create a supply of horses in excess of the number which the trade of the country will support. The Committee will remember that some time ago a Commission went to Canada for the purpose of ascertaining what horses could be obtained there; they went to Canada, as I have said, and they brought back 73 horses. When the Commission returned, I asked one of the members if he could get 1,000 horses in Canada. He said that he could not. I then asked him if he could get 500, and I think his reply was that he might get about that number. I must confess that the result of my inquiries is that in case of a great European war, I believe we should have the greatest possible difficulty either in mounting the Cavalry, or in getting the necessary draft horses for the Royal Artillery, Engineers, and Transport Corps. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War has conceded a certain amount of Transport to Infantry regiments, and I look upon that as one of the best steps taken for many years. When the Egyptian War broke out, Infantry men were sent down to Aldershot for three days training in the art of saddling and tending horses; but, of course, when they landed in Egypt they were found to be so totally ignorant of the duties required of them that the transport broke down. Finally, I am glad to hear that there is to be a certain number of mules kept in stock. These are very useful animals, but somewhat difficult to manage. It might be well that some provision should be made in respect of camels, having regard to the enormous loss of these animals which occurred in Egypt—but that, of course, would be impossible in this country.

Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram

COLONEL EYRE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough): With the indulgence of the Committee, I wish to make some observations on the subject of the Horse Artillery. In doing so, I feel that I shall be not only acting fairly to my constituents, but to a great many of my brother officers outside the House. Not having been an Artilleryman myself, I shall not enter into any details; but I may, perhaps, be allowed to express an opinion on the subject generally, which I think will be a correct one, having served with the Rifle Brigade throughout the Indian Mutiny. In the first place, I will give, not my own, but the opinions of high authorities with regard to the value of Artillery in Asiatic warfare. Sir Colin Campbell—afterwards Lord Clyde—took care that, as far as lay in his power, to every column which was formed there should be attached a body of Horse Artillery; and so important did he regard this, that he gave directions to every column that whenever they attacked any fortified place they should first bring Artillery to bear upon it. Passing from the opinion of Lord Clyde on this matter, I will quote from some correspondence and papers relating to the East India Horse Artillery during the time of the Indian Mutiny—in the years 1857 and 1859—when a great change had to be carried out with regard to that branch of the Service. Military letter from the Court of Directors to the Secretary of State for India, No. 123, dated July, 1857, has this passage—

“As no doubt whatever can be entertained of the necessity for an augmentation of this important arm of the Service, we are of opinion that no time should be lost in collecting the means for rendering it effective at the earliest possible period.”

I will now read an extract from a Minute of the Governor General of India (Lord Canning), dated 9th of August, 1858, which says—

“I do not believe that any reduction worth counting can safely be made. With every allowance for the greater trustworthiness and, in some respects, greater efficiency of European Artillery, the ground which has to be covered is the same—I see no hope of a diminution of the aggregate Force.”

Another good authority—Brigadier General Jacob—said—“The strength of the Artillery should be increased.” Sir J. L. Lawrence also said—

“The value of Artillery is, perhaps, greater in Asia than in any other part of the world. Guns are objects of intense fear to the Natives of India. A small European Force with a powerful Artillery would be irresistible.”

This Minute of the Governor General of India is dated the 24th of August, 1858. Another Minute says that—“At the end of a march the active exertions of Artillery are needed;” and I am in a position to bear that out from my own experience, because at the end of a long march it is impossible for the troops to move, and it is necessary that you should be able to send off at once some guns to the spot where they are required. Another Despatch of the Military Department, No. 644, says—

“The Government in Council instructs me to recommend earnestly that the subject of the total inadequacy of the strength of the Artillery may receive the serious consideration of the Governor General of India.”

The date of that is the 26th of February, 1857. Then we have a letter from the Adjutant General of the Army to the Government Secretary to this effect—

“I am directed to state that the Commander-in-Chief cannot too earnestly press upon the attention of the Government a third time the subject regarding the total inadequacy of the strength of the Corps of Artillery.”

That is dated the 14th day of February, 1857. Again, Despatch No. 804, dated the 10th of March, 1857, from the Secretary to the Governor of Madras to the Governor General of India, says—

“I am directed to forward you a letter from the Quartermaster General of the Madras Army urging the necessity for an increase in this branch.”

Then there are in a Memorandum by General Beresford, dated the 29th of August, 1857, these words—

“I would urge that no consideration of expense should in any way be allowed to interfere with efficiency in so vital an arm as the Artillery.”

And, finally, the Commander-in-Chief in India referred, in a Minute of the 19th of August, 1857, to the hesitation to increase the Artillery as “straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel.” I think I have brought forward enough statements on the part of those in authority to show how important and how valuable the Artillery was considered to be in Asiatic warfare. If there should be war again, the probability is that it will arise in some part of Asia, and therefore I venture to say that we should not have decrease in the number of our Artillery, but rather that there should be an increase. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War has, in the course of his remarks, expressed the hope that if any Member of the Committee had in his mind any ideas that would tend in the direction of economy, they would be stated. I wish to call attention to one point on which I think that economy can be effected, and I refer to those expensive luxuries, Brigade Depôts, in connection with which I believe that a stroke of the pen would have the effect of saving a considerable sum of money. I think, then, that each brigadier should be responsible for everything which goes on in his brigade, and cease to be what he undoubtedly is now—a nonentity. I will give an instance or two of what is continually occurring. A short time ago my servant had occasion to ride a short distance to the Brigade Depôt in Derby to ask for a military surgeon to be sent to an ambulance corps which I have; he received a letter saying that my letter would be forwarded to York, and after considerable delay it arrived at last at the proper place. I say that all this is absolute waste of time, and I cannot see why the brigadier should not have sent the surgeon to the barracks on his own authority. In another case, the adjutant wrote to the Brigade Depôt at no great distance to ask for a surgeon to come and examine an animal that was sore. The letter went from the adjutant to the Major General commanding the division at York; from him it went back to the Brigadier, from him to the adjutant of the Volunteer regiment, asking him to fix a day. When this was done, it went again to Derby, and the result was that, instead of a surgeon being sent from Derby, the county had to pay for a surgeon coming all the way from Birmingham. I suggest that, instead of economizing by cutting down the strength of the Artillery, we should begin by making necessary reforms in such matters as I have referred to. I earnestly trust the right hon. Gentleman will give his attention to these points, and I shall be most happy to assist him in case of need with the statistics and correspondence with which, as commanding officer, I am flooded.

Colonel Eyre

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I wish to point out, with regard to what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope), that the increase in the number of Garrison Artillery is only an increase in the Reserve, which is an extremely different thing from an increase in the strength of the effective. The hon. and gallant Baronet who represents the Fareham Division of Hants (Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram), like the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, also dwelt on the necessity of increasing the number of Garrison guns, and of having a sufficient number of well-trained men to work them. The hon. and gallant Baronet proposed that a certain number of Infantry men should be instructed in the management of garrison guns. That proposal appears to me a strange one, because, from what I have seen of Infantry soldiers, I venture to think that they are not the class of men who are best fitted for work of that kind. I suggest that you will get a sufficient number of men to work the guns in this way—that you should have a separate class of men in the Garrison Artillery, amounting to, say, one-third of the total number, who should bear the same relation to ordinary gunners as the A.B.s bear to ordinary seamen. Now, the only way that you can secure that is by giving a certain number of the men a higher rate of pay when they show proficiency in the management of the complicated machinery connected with some of the new guns, such as hydraulic buffers and the various moving gear, all of which complicated machinery requires for its handling skilled workmen, and not ordinary soldiers. I think some recognition of this fact ought to take place, and that an efficient body of Garrison gunners should be established, which, in my opinion, could be obtained, as I have said, by the increase of pay. This matter, which is one of great importance, I think, is well worthy of the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, who, I am glad to see, is alive to the importance of improving the Garrison Artillery. I do not state this on my own opinion alone, but from my knowledge that the plan is one which commends itself to a large number of Artillery

lery officers. The right hon. Gentleman stated that a certain number of our batteries of Artillery ought to be kept on a peace footing; and there I agree with him, because I could never understand why this country should be the only one which keeps its Artillery on a war footing. No doubt, it would, from an effective point of view, be better that the Force should be kept on a war footing; but the question is whether it would be worth the money you would have to pay for it. Therefore, although the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is one which would not commend itself as a general rule to Army men in this House, yet, I think, he is quite right in saying that the whole of our Artillery ought not to be kept on a war footing. I must say that, in my opinion, the Secretary of State for War is making a great blunder in the matter of the Horse Artillery. The right hon. Gentleman pointed out that it was his duty in this matter to choose his advisers—and I have no doubt that he endeavours to obtain the best advice possible in matters relating to his Department—but on this occasion I do not think he has been well advised, nor do I think that the country will be satisfied with a Minister of War who relies upon technical advice only. The country wants a little more than that; and they will hold him responsible, notwithstanding the trouble he takes to get the best advice, if mistakes are made. I think I can see the way in which the right hon. Gentleman has gone wrong in connection with this subject. There is a new plan in the heads of the War Office Authorities. It is to have the Corps modelled on the Continental system—to have two Corps d'Armées. The new idea is to have 70,000 men ready to be sent away at a few days' notice. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman seems to point to the reduction of our military strength for the purpose of making these Corps d'Armées perfectly efficient. I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that military advisers are often very unsafe guides. They will try to make the Army efficient, no doubt; but then they have very little idea of the cost which is involved; and although I do not believe that the country would care about the ultimate cost, provided that efficiency were obtained, yet the advice which has the effect of placing a large additional sum upon the military vote is not likely to be held in high estimation by the Minister of War. I believe that if you have two efficient Corps d'Armées only the people will cry out that 70,000 are too few, and that you will have to establish a third Corps d'Armée.

MR. E. STANHOPE: It is not proposed to reduce the strength of the Army outside the two Army Corps of the Reserve in any case.

COLONEL NOLAN: I am very glad that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War has given that explanation, because it shows how very important it is that our Army should not be reduced to two Corps d'Armées. I point out, however, that the right hon. Gentleman has taken the first step in this direction; he has struck at one arm of the Service, although he has not more Horse Artillery than is sufficient for two Corps d'Armées, and his proposed reduction will have to be joined with reductions in other arms, and the Cavalry, for instance, may have to be reduced. You are, at all events, striking at the very arm which it takes longest to create; and which, on an emergency, it will be impossible to improvise. It is not an easy matter to produce Garrison Artillery, but it takes months and years to produce efficient Horse Artillery. I think that this plan ought to be very carefully considered by the public. The Corps will, no doubt, be very good and efficient in the main, and they are sure to be excellent on Paper; but if you are going to have them at the expense of the Military Establishments of the country, I think you are buying them too dearly. The fact that these Corps are to be ready at a moment's notice shows that you are keeping up your Army for offensive purposes. But suppose that your two Corps d'Armées were sent abroad, and that they surrendered, you will have no Horse Artillery at home, and in that respect you will be at a great disadvantage. Anyone can see that it is a very rash thing to destroy that which has been created at great expense, and which it takes a long time to replace. It is an easy thing to cut down the tree which is many years in growing. What the Government are doing suggests something very like the act of a man who, having furnished his house at great cost, breaks up expensive chairs and tables for use as firewood. But what is to be done with the men of the batteries?

Surely the right hon. Gentleman is not going to turn them into Garrison Artillerymen? Probably they will gradually be brought back when they have lost some of their efficiency and smartness. On the whole, I think the right hon. Gentleman has been led into taking a step which, besides doing a considerable amount of injury directly and indirectly by unsettling men's minds, will prove in the end to be a very costly one. There is another subject which has not been referred to except by the hon. and gallant Member for the Fareham Division of Hants, and on which I wish to make a few remarks. I refer to the expedition to Canada for the purpose of buying horses. That is a step on which I think the opinion of the Committee ought to be taken, because anything more contrary to military and political economy I cannot conceive. You go 2,000 miles to try to open up a new supply of horses, a new market as you say, but nothing can be more unfair to the people of this country. Instead of trying to open a new market in Canada, you should increase your price and then—although you might not get what you wanted in the first—you, in a year or two—you would be able to get plenty of horses. These horses from Canada cannot be landed here at a less cost than £60 or £70 each. It has always been the theory that a country in time of peace should get as many horses as possible from internal sources, although in time of war the more horses bought in foreign markets the better, because you prevent the enemy getting them. I think the mission to Canada was a most ill-judged measure, and I should be glad if some hon. Member would move a reduction of this Vote as a protest against what I consider a most unfair proceeding towards the horse breeders in the country.

SIR FREDERICK FITZ-WYGRAM: The object of the Commission sent to Canada was to test the market in case horses should be scarce here, and to get a small number of horses sent over for the purpose of seeing whether or not they were suitable for military service.

MR. TOTTENHAM (Winchester): I shall not trouble the Committee with a repetition of the figures and arguments that have been used against the reduction of the Horse Artillery; I shall say nothing further than that I agree with all that has fallen from previous speakers on the subject, and express a hope that the country will not have cause to regret a step which I believe is fatal to the efficiency of the Horse Artillery as an arm of the Service and detrimental to the interests of the country. We have had the cases of two classes of officers brought before the Committee by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, that is to say of the paymasters and quartermasters. I am glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) express his opinion that there is justice in the case of the paymasters, and that in all probability their grievance will be removed. I should have been more glad to hear that the quartermasters would be given something more than honorary rank, and that the concession would have been more of a financial character; and that, I think, is the point of view from which the quartermasters themselves will look at the matter. But the class whose claims I wish to bring before the Committee is that of the present commanding officers of regiments and battalions. Within the year 1886-7 there will have been no less than 107 of these officers relegated to half-pay, and of these six will have been in command for little more than a year, 87 between one and two years, and 14 between two and three years. Previous to 1871, the period of command was practically unlimited. From 1871 to 1881 the period of command was fixed at five years, from 1881 to 1886 the period was fixed at four years, and it was also provided by the same Royal Warrant that, after having served five years as a lieutenant-colonel, whether second or first in command, the officer should be placed on half-pay. Now, a new Royal Warrant has been issued within the last few months, by which it is enacted that in future an officer shall command his regiment for four years, no matter for what length of time he may be second in command. This is a sensible and reasonable arrangement; but because that arrangement has been made in the case of future commanding officers there appears to be no reason why officers, who are now commanding regiments, should be relegated to half-pay, and practically put on the shelf for the rest of their military lives any more than those who are to have command for four years in future. It has been said that one reason for doing this is that it is hard, or would be hard, upon those who have to succeed to the command; but I maintain that it is no harder upon them now than it was previously to 1881, and that officers would actually succeed now to the command of their regiments in a shorter time than they would previously to 1881. Just as an instance of the hardship that has been done certain officers, let me name one or two out of the long list of cases which has been prepared by officers who are interested in this matter. I take the case of the officer commanding the present 10th Hussars: he was 25 years in the Service before he got command of his regiment; he was five years second in command, and under the existing regulations, under the Royal Warrant of 1881, he lost his command after he had been one year and five months in possession of it. Then I take the case of the officer commanding the Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry: he was 29 years in the Service before he got command; he was five years second in command, and he will have been but one year in command of his regiment when he has to retire on half-pay. The whole 107 I have mentioned are similar to these, varying only in degree. Now, I say it is hard upon these officers that they should lose what all officers look forward to as the reward of their exertions—namely, the command of their regiment. It is no argument to say they have been second lieutenant-colonels, or second in command. Every one who is acquainted with military life knows that the second in command is only the second fiddle, that he has no status at all in fact, that he hardly considers himself in the position of second lieutenant-colonel, and that often he is very much better off without the rank, and very much in the way. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War will be able to tell us that the position of these officers will be reconsidered by him. These officers have been selected for the command of their regiment as efficient and properly qualified officers, and there seems to be no reason whatever why they should be punished for the benefit of those who have to succeed, if really it is for their benefit. I hope before this Vote is taken that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give us some assurances that this matter will receive his consideration. There is one other point I should like to lay before the Committee, and that is in reference to the Question which was asked by myself of the Secretary of State for War within the last few days—namely, the strength or establishment of the two Army Corps which are about to be formed. We were informed by the right hon. Gentleman that he was about to lay a Paper upon the subject on the Table of the House; but I very much fear from the Answer to another Question in regard to the strength of the batteries which are to remain in the Horse Artillery, that the establishment of these Army Corps is to be a peace establishment. If that is so, it is simply continuing the present childish system of skeleton regiments at home. It cannot be anything else. The regiments will be actually incapable and inefficient to take the field. If we want any instance of the condition in which our regiments are when suddenly called upon for service, we have only to recollect the state in which they were in at the time of the outbreak of the Egyptian War. Two Cavalry regiments had to be entirely broken up to form two squadrons for the Egyptian War. We have the case of other regiments which were sent during the same period to the Mediterranean, one half of them never having gone through a course of musketry, and more than half in some cases being under one year's service. I hope that will not be the state in which these two Army Corps are to be left. I trust my right hon. Friend will be able to assure us that the regiments which are to form the two Army Corps will, at all events, be kept at proper strength and in thoroughly efficient condition.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): There are just one or two matters to which I should like to refer at once. In the first place, let me say a word with regard to the question of the horse supply to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South-East Durham (Sir Henry Havelock Allan) called attention. Although an experiment was made with regard to Canada by sending out an officer to see what amount of horse supply could be reckoned upon from that country, it is felt that the proper course for the War Office to adopt is to rely upon the home supply of horses, and not on any supply from foreign countries or even from our Colonies. I do not yet know what the result of the Canadian experiment will be; but when we receive a full Report, I want to make out in the fairest possible way the cost per horse. Then there are two subjects which my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Tottenham) has mentioned. The first is in regard to the position of the Army Corps. I am afraid I must ask him to restrain still further his natural impatience. I hope to present in a very short time full details of the composition of the two Army Corps. I am going through the matter myself at the present time, and I hope shortly to be able to lay before the House full details as to how the Army Corps are to be composed, so that the House and the country can judge for themselves how far it is likely that with a little more time given to us we can put the scheme into thoroughly practical effect.

MR. TOTTENHAM (Winchester): Perhaps I may be allowed to say that I merely asked whether the two Army Corps were to be kept at a peace or war establishment.

MR. E. STANHOPE: If I wanted to go into that subject, I should have to go into it at great length indeed. Then, my hon. Friend called attention to the question of retirement of commanding officers of regiments. I confess I have seen cases myself where very excellent officers, officers whose services the country ought to be sorry to lose, have, by the operation of this scheme, been compelled to retire from the command of regiments. I have been very sorry for them indeed; but, as my hon. Friend knows, the whole of this matter was thoroughly considered before the late Royal Warrant was issued. Those who were concerned in the framing of the Royal Warrant considered it in all its bearings, and they came to the conclusion that, on the whole, the rule laid down must be insisted upon. I am afraid someone or other must suffer. If you were to extend the terms of employment of lieutenant colonels, then majors must retire, and certainly I should be very sorry to see any further punishment inflicted upon majors. I have not yet had very much opportunity of looking into the matter; but I mean to do so, and if I find I can do anything to meet the views of my hon. Friend, I shall be only too glad to do it.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): Mr. Courtney, nothing strikes one more in these discussions upon naval and military matters than the utter hollowness of the debates. A Minister, advised by no one knows whom, certainly by no military authority, takes a step which is of the most vital importance, comes down to the House without asking for an opportunity of taking the House into his counsel in regard to this step, and then thinks that if some hon. Members get up and grumble for five or ten minutes, that is all that is necessary. I entirely disagree with such a method of carrying on debates upon such serious subjects. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South-East Durham (Sir Henry Havelock-Allan), towards the close of his remarks, asked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) if the reduction of the Horse Artillery had been finally decided upon, and the right hon. Gentleman with great alacrity jumped up and said—"Yes, finally decided." Thereupon the hon. and gallant Gentleman said—"If that is so, it is not much use our discussing the matter." I am astonished at him, because if there is anything that the whole military opinion of this House, the whole military opinion of this country, is entirely opposed to, it is to the action which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War has taken in regard to the Horse Artillery. It depends entirely upon the military Members of this House whether the Horse Artillery shall be reduced or not. Of course, if hon. and gallant Gentlemen come down here and think they have done their duty sufficiently in grumbling at what has been done, and declining to take any action which will give public expression to their opinions, they have no one to blame but themselves. I have taken some interest in this question of the reduction of the Horse Artillery, and I have come to this conclusion, that of all the unpatriotic actions that have ever been perpetrated by any Government this is the most unpatriotic. I do not at all wish it for one moment to be understood that I mean to say that it is the desire of the Government to be unpatriotic; but that, as far as its effects go, this step is the most unpatriotic act that has ever been committed by a Government in Army matters. Now, Sir, the English Army of all the Armies in Europe is the one that ought to have not only its full, but the fullest measure of Horse Artillery. Whenever you have a small Army like the English Army, which may at any moment be called upon to face some Continental Army, you are absolutely at a discount if you have not got your full measure of Horse Artillery, and more than your full measure. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Galway (Colonel Nolan) mentioned, in speaking of the Field Artillery, that during the Franco-German War the French were able to get together some good Field Artillery in three months. I served in that unfortunate war, and I can assure my hon. and gallant Friend that he is entirely mistaken. Even after three or four months training our Field Artillery was not worth a straw. I will go further, and say that the greatest loss and difficulty which we experienced during the whole of that war was caused by the want of Horse Artillery. I will not detain the Committee by giving them examples, but I could give them examples by the score of our formations being peppered, our ranks broken, and every movement we had intended to take obstructed, owing to the rapidity and accuracy of the fire of the German Horse Artillery. Our want of Horse Artillery was felt during the whole war, but especially in the latter end. Men who had had long experience in military matters, my own chief, for instance, often said to me, in the course of our conversations, it was almost impossible to do anything owing to the want of Horse Artillery. Now, in the English Army you want, above all things, Horse Artillery; and, for the life of me, I cannot understand what object the Government can have in taking a step so fatal to the interests of this country as the reduction of the Horse Artillery. If it is a question of economy, how much will you save—do you save anything that is worth thinking about? As I understand, the total saving will be something like £4,000 or £5,000 per annum, and for this miserable bit of childish economy you are going to destroy a portion of your Force, which it will take you two or three years to replace. If you are ever engaged in an European war, you will assuredly find it necessary to replace these men;

but that to do so will take you a very considerable time, at least two years. You will find that you have reduced this arm of the Service at a loss of life and loss of prestige in the earlier part of that war, for which nothing will ever repay you. Now, upon the question of economy, are there not plenty of Departments in which you could effect economy infinitely greater than this, and without in the least endangering the interest of your Service? If anyone had the time and the inclination to devote a week's study to the Estimates, they would find means of making reductions which would simply be appalling, and in the face of which this economy is a myth. Take the case of the Civil Service. I have it upon the authority of one who knows perhaps as well as any man connected with the Civil Service of this country what economies may be made without in the least injuring the Service, that if economies which should and ought to be made were made, the Government would be able to take off 1*d.* of the Income Tax. What is true in regard to the Civil Service is equally true in regard to the Naval Service, and especially in regard to the Army Service. I grant it is a good thing to have two Army Corps; I think it would be a good thing if you had troops ready; I know that during the late Egyptian War your highest authority in this country said that if he were called upon to send another regiment to Egypt, he could not do so. So far as your Army Corps go, I am entirely with you; but I ask most seriously what is the object of reducing the Horse Artillery? You are going to turn them into Field Artillery; in two years time they will not be worth a straw for the purpose of Horse Artillery. Now, I do not believe that any step that any Government has ever taken cannot be retraced. I believe that if the military men will only take a firm stand in the matter, this Horse Artillery will be replaced in six months. The only way to give effect to the opinion of this House is to take a Division, and for that reason I propose, as a practical protest against this fatal step, that this Vote be reduced by the sum of £5,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £2,993,000, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Molloy.)

Mr. MALLOCK (Devon, Torquay): Though I regret very much the decision the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. E. Stanhope) has thought it his duty to come to with respect to the Horse Artillery, I congratulate him on his determination to strengthen the Garrison Artillery. That branch of the Artillery is a very valuable Service, and it has not generally received the recognition that is due to it. I wish now especially to refer to the Volunteer batteries of Garrison Artillery—I do not believe they are receiving the training they ought to receive. This subject is of great interest to many of my constituents, and, having served in the Royal Artillery myself for 11 or 12 years, and for a greater part of that time in the Garrison Artillery, it is a subject in which I take very great interest. I believe that if the Volunteer Artillery were called upon for active service they would be required to garrison such places as Plymouth, Dover, and Portsmouth. Therefore, one would suppose that their training in time of peace would consist in working those guns which they would have to work in time of war. But what, Sir, is the fact? There are a great many Volunteer Artillery batteries who never see any gun larger than an old 32-pounder smooth-bore, or a 64-pounder rifle gun. The training they get at these guns is no use whatever in working the heavier guns they would have to man in case they garrisoned these forts. It is true that a small percentage of every Garrison battery is sent annually into some of these forts; and I believe, too—at least it ought to be the case—that those Volunteer batteries who are fortunate enough to be situated within easy distance of forts where heavy guns are mounted have opportunities of working at these guns. But there are numbers of batteries who never have any chance whatever of learning their drill at the heavy guns—at the 12-tons, 18-tons, and still heavier guns, which are mounted at these forts. No doubt, to give all Volunteer Artillery the extra training I desire to see them have would entail some extra expense; but when I remember the vast sums that have been spent on our fortifications and our armaments, I think we ought not to begrudge the slight extra expenditure which would be involved in instructing these men in the duties they would have to perform if they had to take charge of these forts and the guns in them. I believe the requisite training might be given to them in one or two ways. Some 12 or 18-ton guns might be mounted somewhere within easy distance of two or three Volunteer batteries, so that they might have a chance of being able to drill with such guns; or a much larger percentage—say, 50 per cent—of our Volunteer Artillery might be sent into the forts yearly to learn their duty with these guns; or, it would be better still, if the whole of the batteries could be sent even once in two years. I believe the best policy would be that nearly all the Volunteers—at all events, the bulk of those who are close to any of these large towns where forts are situated—should be Artillery as far as possible; certainly every encouragement should be held out to Volunteers in the neighbourhood of seaports to become Artillery Volunteer Corps. A rifleman can have his weapon anywhere, and he can find drill grounds at any place; but an artilleryman's gun cannot be brought to him, therefore it necessary he should be taken to the gun. Unless he has sufficient opportunities of drilling with heavy guns he can never become a valuable soldier. It is not only with the object of learning his drill with heavy guns that he should be sent to these places, but also that he should learn the ins-and-outs of the various forts, that he should be acquainted with all the arrangements of magazines, and stores, and lifts, and the thousand and one other arrangements which are necessary for the effective service of the heavy ordnance in these forts. This subject may not be a very interesting one, but I believe it is one well worth the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and I am sure that the more opportunities the men of the Volunteer Garrison Artillery have of perfecting themselves in their drill and duties the more popular that branch of the Service will become.

COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): Mr. Courtney, I am anxious to say a word upon one point which has not been touched upon up to this, but which I believe to be equal in importance to anything that has been mentioned, and that is the reduction of the home battalions of Infantry. Those

Gentlemen of the Committee who are not connected with the Service must understand that, after all, the Infantry bears the same relation to the other arms of the Service that the joint bears to the other dishes of a dinner, that the Infantry is the main stay. Now, the home battalions of Infantry have been reduced to 730 men; before Lord Airlie's Committee evidence was given which showed that when a battalion was sent on service one-fourth of the men were found to be, from various causes, unfit for active service, that reduces the 730 men to 548. To complete the war strength of a battalion you have to put in 252 fresh men. Well, now, that means that the new comers are nearly half, at any rate, a good many more than one-third, of the men left in the battalion, a very serious matter indeed. And, when the Committee understands that, at the present time, according to the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting, there are 350 men in each Regiment of only one year's service, they will see that, if the home battalions are reduced much more they will be very inefficient to go on service. When once the Secretary of State for War begins nibbling at the battalions, there is a great danger that the 30 men who are above the 700 will be cut off the next year. I strongly urge upon the right hon. Gentleman not to do that on any account. The Infantry, after all, is the most important body to us in our Army. It is true that our battalions have too many young soldiers in them, and it would be very desirable if men in the Reserve, as has been suggested, were allowed to reenlist. But if they do so, in my opinion, they should be placed under an enforced stoppage of pay, in order to provide their own retirement allowance. I believe we are fast approaching the time when every Government official, from the Prime Minister down to the policeman and the postman, must be subjected to a compulsory stoppage for retirement allowances, or else that the charge should be made en bloc against the accounts of the year, for the amount thrown upon futurity in the shape of pensions discounted is becoming something terrible to contemplate. Now, in regard to the Artillery question. The Horse Artillery batteries are really wanted as reserves for India, and it would be far better to keep them, even if they had to be dismantled in turn, than to disband them. I doubt very much the necessity for the proposed great increase of the Garrison Artillery. This country, hitherto, has always found that a good thrust is the best parry, and though it is very necessary that our coaling stations should be fortified, and that our ports should be fortified, I believe that the defence of these places may be left, to a very much greater extent than is supposed, to our Auxiliary Forces. I think the Secretary of State for War would do a great service if he induced Volunteer battalions in the neighbourhood of our forts and ports to be converted into Artillery. I will not detain the Committee longer; but I do strongly urge upon the Secretary of State for War the necessity of keeping our home battalions at 750 men if it is possible, and the other battalions at 850 men, because the experience of the last 20 years has shown us that our case is entirely dissimilar from that of foreign countries. Our battalions must be ready to go into the field at any moment, and we ought to be able to meet the wants of little wars such as we have had of late years without calling out our Reserves, except, perhaps, the last two years Reserves or the men of the Reserve who volunteer. We have been doing a most serious thing in regard to our Reserves; when the Reserves were first formed it was, I think, expected they would have to fight in a European war—say, once in a generation. Well, now we have had them out in whole or in part three times in little more than half that time. Now, that is a very serious thing; it prevents Reserve men getting employment in the country, and, therefore, is very detrimental to their interests. We ought only to call upon our Reserves in serious emergencies as was originally intended, and the only possible way of doing that is to keep our battalions at their proper strength. When our Reserves were first formed in 1870, Mr. Cardwell calculated upon having a Reserve of 60,000; the statement of the Secretary of State for War this year shows us that by the year 1894 we shall have 60,000 Reserve men. That means in five-sixths of a generation, after the number of 60,000 was fixed upon, and in that time the nation will have grown probably by 8,000,000 of men. I particularly want to draw the attention of the Secretary of State for War to this

The cost of maintaining our forces should be calculated upon the cost per head of the population. That is the only fair way of looking at the cost of our Force.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am sorry my hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Blundell) has been an exception to the almost universal rule in this debate, inasmuch as he disparages the increase of the Garrison Artillery. I can assure him there is no subject to which I have given more personal attention than that. I think there can be no question that the increase of our Garrison Artillery is the most important step that can be taken for the defence of the country, and I am satisfied that if my hon. and gallant Friend will give me a half-an-hour of his time I can show him that there are very important places which cannot be adequately defended unless this House consent to add to the Garrison Artillery. Now, as regards the other point, which has really been hardly discussed in this House to-night upon a proper footing. The real question is—whether Horse Artillery, or Field Artillery, is better for our purposes in time of war. The line I have endeavoured to take up, and in which I have been supported by military experts, is that you do want a certain proportion of Horse Artillery, but that for many purposes the Field Artillery is very much more valuable than Horse Artillery can be. They have a better gun, or they will shortly have about the best gun it is possible for Field Artillery to have. We believe that in time of war Field Artillery batteries will be more efficient, and able to provide a greater amount of gun power, than Horse Artillery will. There is, I think, a certain portion of our Artillery which must be capable of rapid movement—that portion, for instance, which is required to move with the Cavalry; but when you go beyond this portion, you will find that Field Artillery provides a better and more efficient arm, because it is able to work guns of greater power. But, having said that, I should like to appeal to the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Molloy), who argues, as a great many other Members do, that we are making a great mistake in reducing the Horse Artillery, and that we are only doing so for the purpose of effecting a very small economy. What step has he taken? He proposes to cut down the Estimates still further—to reduce still further the sum of money we have for the purpose of all our various kinds of defence. I should be exceedingly sorry if that lame and impolitic step were taken to-night. I regret the proposal I have made and carried out has not been received by hon. Members with any favour, yet, at the same time, I cannot understand why hon. Members, who object to the reduction in strength of the Horse Artillery, favour a reduction in the amount of the Vote for the Army generally.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): The argument the right hon. Gentleman has just used I have heard used in this House for the last nine years. Whenever a Member of this House rises to protest against what he thinks an unwise step on the part of the Government, and moves the reduction of a Vote, the Government say—"Oh, your method of proceeding makes matters worse." If the right hon. Gentleman will tell me how we are to protest against an act, which certainly a large proportion of Members disagree with, except by moving a reduction of the Vote, I shall be very glad to put what he says into practice. If he would prefer it, I will merely move to reduce the Vote by £1—I simply make my Motion as a protest. Of course, there is no use in trying to conceal from ourselves the fact that my proposition to reduce the Vote has as much chance of being carried as I should have, if I so wished, of replacing the right hon. Gentleman by myself. I do think that it is necessary, in these matters, to get rid of the hollowness of debate which has been apparent so long; that we should publicly show our disagreement with the action of the Government, which we can only do by taking a vote on the subject. If I thought that my Motion had any chance of being carried, I would certainly not go to a Division, because the effect of its adoption would be to injure the Service still more. The right hon. Gentleman is far abler in these matters than myself, and I am satisfied that what he has done he has done from thoroughly conscientious motives; but the difficulty is this—that all the military opinions of the country disagree with the right hon. Gentleman. I do not know who the advisers of the Government are in this matter. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South-East Durham (General

Colonel Blundell

Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) said he had made inquiries in every Department to find out who had advised the Government, but he had been unable to discover their advisers. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War seems to be under the impression that the best thing the country can do is to strengthen its Field Artillery. Do that as much as you like; but if you are going to strengthen one arm of the Service by weakening another I must disapprove your action. For the sake of the paltry and miserable economy of £4,000 or £5,000 a-year you are going to disband that branch of the Service which is really the most useful you have in time of war.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, South): So far from desiring to reduce this Vote, I personally should like to add something to it, to enable the Volunteer Artillery to acquire a proper knowledge of the working of the guns they will have to work in case their services are ever required. They have not at present that opportunity; they have to drill with guns that are distinctly obsolete; and it is rather discouraging to them that they should spend their time in learning that which is not directly applicable to the purpose they may be called upon to serve. There are some Artillery Volunteer Corps who have the advantage of being within reasonable distance of ports, and they have an opportunity of acquiring the knowledge they ought to have; but there are others. Take, for instance, my own regiment, which has within it 1,250 efficient gunners—which are situated very considerable distances from any large fort, and the only opportunity such batteries have of seeing the larger guns, and becoming at all acquainted with the interior of forts, magazines, and so on, is that afforded by being sent down to exercise with the Royal Artillery. These opportunities come very rarely, and they are seized by Volunteer officers, and I think that, if some money could be granted to give to the Volunteer Corps the opportunity of more frequently visiting large ports, the boon would be very much appreciated. It has been suggested by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for South Hampshire (Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram) that something might be done by placing these large guns at depôt centres. That, no doubt, would be something for us; we should have an opportunity of practising with such guns; but I have in mind a case in which it might be desirable that these guns might be so placed as not only to be valuable for drill, but for the defence of the country. I have in my mind particularly the case of the Bristol Channel, where a heavy gun would be of the greatest possible service in the defence of the roadstead; and, at the same time, be valuable for drill. I venture to impress on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War the fact that the Volunteer Artillery are most anxious to do all in their power to acquire a knowledge of the modern guns, and to assure him that any assistance he may give in that direction will be very much appreciated.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): While I shall not vote for the proposed reduction, I wish it to be understood that I am opposed to the reduction of the Horse Artillery; no one in this House has stronger views on this subject than I have. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that he has only been a few months in Office. I do hope that when he has been longer in Office, as I trust he will be, he will see his way to reconsider his decision as regards the Horse Artillery. It is impossible to make gunners in a day, and I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will endeavour to defer to the feelings of the vast majority of military experts upon this question.

SIR EDWARD HAMLEY (Birkenhead): I have not quite succeeded in gathering from the Secretary of State for War whether his proposed reduction of the Horse Artillery is still open to revision. If he has not committed himself beyond recall, I venture most earnestly to beseech him to reconsider his decision, because it seems to me one of the most unpopular and impolitic steps ever taken by the War Office. I ask him to consider that all the Military and Naval Members of the House have joined in the very respectful and very strong remonstrations against the step which he proposes, and I think perhaps their opinions may be considered as well worthy his attention as those of that distinguished General of whom we have heard so much, and whose opinions, I think, go to show that a man may be a distinguished General and yet a very unsafe adviser for a Secretary of State for War. I think everything has been said in the course of the remarks of previous speakers that can be said against this measure, and therefore I do not propose to go over the ground again, or any part of it; but I do wish to take this opportunity of recording my earnest protest against the reduction of a single gun either of the Field or of the Horse Artillery.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR (Kincardine): I must, with deep regret, give my vote for the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for King's County (Mr. Molloy), though I assure the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that I shall not give my vote in any factious spirit. I entirely disapprove of the proposed reduction in the Horse Artillery, and I trust that before long the right hon. Gentleman may see his way to retrace this fatal step. I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman would act wisely if he were to dissociate himself from his present military advisers and act solely upon his own responsibility, which, I am sure, would lead him to agree with the tenour of the remarks which have been so generally expressed by hon. and gallant Gentlemen to-night.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I just wish to say that I represent the military town of Canterbury, and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that it is the opinion of all the military men there that he has committed a serious mistake in the matter of the Horse Artillery. I, therefore, trust he will reconsider his decision.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I apprehend that this Vote on Account will be sufficient for the Government until the commencement of July; but it certainly is a very unprecedented course that the Estimates should have been practically put off until so late a day, and that Votes on Account should have been taken. The Government can hardly complain, if they choose to adopt this course, of everyone of these items being discussed seriatim. For my own part, I am anxious that Public Business should not be impeded in any way, and, therefore, I am afraid we shall have to wait in order to discuss every one of the items until they come on in the shape of ordinary Estimates. However, in Class I there is one Estimate which, I think, we ought to test—namely, that for the Metropolitan Police Courts. It will be seen that the total amount asked for the year under this head is £6,737; and taking the sum voted on Account on a previous occasion and the amount now asked for, we see that almost one-half of the whole will be voted on Account. Now, it is not a question of how much shall be voted, or whether the money is wholly or partly expended. The question is whether this money ought to be voted at all by the House of Commons? I, and others on this side of the House, and I believe many on the other side of the House also, have always contended that this is an expenditure which ought to fall on the Metropolis itself. I remember on the last Vote on Account I called the attention of the Committee to this matter, and I think the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Commissioner of Public Works (Mr. Plunket) replied to me that there was a set-off, because the County Courts were paid for out of the Treasury. But I need hardly say that that is no set-off of any sort or kind. In Manchester and Liverpool, and most of our large towns, there are County Courts and Police Courts, and in London there are County Courts and Police Courts, and there is no set-off in saying that the County Courts in Provincial towns are paid for by the Treasury, because the County Courts in London are also paid for by the Treasury. We have the clear, hard fact, then, before us, that in all large towns the Police Courts are paid for out of the local rates, but that in London they are paid for by the Treasury. The matter has been frequently raised in this House, and there are Gentlemen on both sides who take the same view upon it that I do. Under these circumstances, I beg to move that the Vote be reduced by this sum of £1,500 which is to be devoted to the Metropolitan Police Courts.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £3,828,800, be granted for the said Services."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): The principle upon which the Metropolitan Police Courts were handed over to the Office of Works to be maintained by them by a Parliamentary Vote was that it was considered that the business of the London Police Courts was, or might be, of a rather more than local character. It was thought that they should be dealt with on the same basis as the Law Courts throughout the country rather than on the example of the Police Courts throughout the other parts of the Kingdom. Doubtless, the Police Court in Bow Street formerly had a very wide and extended jurisdiction, its writs running all over the country. But whatever may have been the principle or policy of the arrangement made, the answer I have to make to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton is, that under an Act of Parliament the Metropolitan Police Courts have been handed over to the Office of Works, and the Office of Works has been required to purchase, hire, or otherwise provide such Court-houses, offices, or buildings as may be required for carrying on the business of the various Police Courts in the Metropolitan Police Districts. These buildings and offices have to be cleaned, lighted, and warmed by the Office of Works. Well, as I have no other funds out of which to defray the expenses of cleaning, lighting, and warming the offices handed over to my charge under the Act to which I have referred, which was passed through Parliament in all its stages without comment, I am obliged to come to this House and ask it to provide means with which to give effect to that Act of Parliament. These are the grounds upon which I ask the Committee to vote this money.

MR. LABOUCHERE: This is rather an explanation than an excuse which we have received from the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I would point out to him that about two years ago it was moved that the expenses of the Parks in London should no longer be borne by the Treasury, but by London. It was agreed then that an Act of Parliament should be brought in by the then Government to throw this expenditure upon the Metropolis. If we were to refuse to pass this Vote, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be able to bring in a Bill, and pass it into an Act of Parliament, and it would become law, by which the charge for these Police Courts would be thrown upon the Metropolis. I do not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman can fairly ask us not to vote against this Estimate simply because there appears to be an Act of Parliament requiring the Office of Works to look after these Police Courts, for the passing of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has given reasons, which reasons experience shows us to be absolutely worthless. He might, perhaps, hold that Bow Street Police Office is in an exceptional position compared with other Police Offices in the country; but he can hardly hold that the Greenwich Police Court or the Wandsworth Police Court, both of which are included in this Vote, are more important Police Courts than those of Manchester, Liverpool, and other large towns in the country. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, this question has long been a bone of contention. I was anxious that Her Majesty's Government, who are so desirous of reform and economy and all that sort of thing, should refrain from proposing this Vote, or should say that if the money were voted for the present, they would bring in a Bill and take care that it should be borne by those who ought to bear it next year. If we receive such an assurance I shall not press the matter to a Division; but unless such an assurance is given I shall divide the Committee upon this item.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I think the objection taken to the Vote is reasonable, and I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not made a very vigorous defence of the principle and policy of paying the expenses of the Metropolitan Police Courts out of the Vote which falls upon the taxpayer of the United Kingdom. Even had he made a vigorous defence of it, I think we should not accept his authority for the course of proceeding referred to, without having some assurances as to the future state of the matter. It is well to tell the House that the Act of Parliament throws a particular duty upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and that he has no funds with which to discharge that duty unless Parliament supplies them. That is a very good excuse for the Vote this year, but what about the Vote next year and the year succeeding? Is the United Kingdom to continue for an indefinite period to contribute to the expense of keeping and maintaining these Police Courts. I think the protest against this state of things is a most reasonable protest, coming from an Englishman; but when we consider the case of Ireland, and consider that a Vote of this kind, for the maintenance of the Metropolitan Police Courts, in which we have not the smallest interest, falls not only on the English taxpayer, but also on the Irish taxpayer, I think the charge is an anomalous and monstrous one. I think before we pass this Vote we are entitled to have some assurance as to what the future state of things is to be. Is the United Kingdom to continue for an indefinite period to contribute towards maintaining the Metropolitan Police Courts? Surely this great City in which we now are is sufficiently wealthy to maintain its own Police Courts. One would think the Municipality of London would be ashamed to come to the taxpayer, hat in hand, begging him to maintain its Police Courts—begging him to pay the costs of getting within the clutches of the law, and of punishing them when they are there, the citizens of London for being drunk and disorderly, and so on. I think this protest is a fair one. I think we are entitled to some assurance that for the future this most anomalous state of things will not be continued, and that the taxpayer of the United Kingdom shall not be compelled to contribute to this purely local purpose.

MR. PLUNKET: I would add one word to what I have already said. I suppose that whenever the Bill for the Government of the Metropolis comes before the House, this will be one of the questions raised in the debates; but when hon. Members ask me to undertake to introduce a Bill for the purpose of putting the cost of the maintenance of the Police Courts on the Metropolis, and to pass that Bill through the House, I must beg them to remember that this is part of a very large question. I would also remind the Committee that very early in this Session I introduced a Bill for the very purpose referred to by the hon. Member for Northampton in another part of his remarks—namely, for the purpose of handing over a certain number of the Parks in London to the Metropolitan Board of Works. I must remind the Committee that I kept putting that Bill down every day, and that it has been hardly an agreeable duty to have to wait here until half-past 1 or 2 o'clock every morning in order merely to postpone the Bill, to say "this day, Sir," when it is called on; but I have been able to proceed no further with it. If we could get some security for the withdrawal of blocks against the Bill, it would, no doubt, have a good effect upon the progress of that measure, and I am glad of this opportunity of calling the attention of the Committee and of the country to the fact that this Bill—a very small Bill, and one which I believe would involve no controversy—has been standing on the Notice Paper day after day for second reading, and night after night, and cannot be disposed of on account of blocks. As to the policy of this Police Court question, I can only repeat that that is a question to be decided when the great question of Metropolitan Government comes up for discussion in this House.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I cannot conceive how a Government which has introduced a Bill for the handing over of some Parks in London to the Metropolitan Board of Works can have any excuse for not introducing a measure to hand over, in a similar manner, the Metropolitan Police Courts to some Metropolitan Authority. It seems to me that there might be some little excuse for imposing the cost of the Parks upon the taxpayers generally. Some of us or our constituents may, on some occasion, be able to derive amusement from the Parks, and may gain some little advantage from them; but I trust very few of our constituents have the smallest desire to derive advantage from the existence of the Police Courts, or, at any rate, will desire to derive instruction and amusement from them. Probably, the tendency of the Government to render these Courts places where amusement and instruction can be derived arises from the peculiar experiences of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman), who, we may suppose, did derive a certain amount of instruction and benefit from one of these institutions. The right hon. Gentleman opposite tells us that the Bill for transferring some of the London Parks to the Metropolitan Board of Works is blocked. Well, Sir, I do not know anything about that Bill, but I suppose it is due to the fact that some London Members desire to save the pockets of the London ratepayers. I trust, at any rate, that no one sitting on this side of the House will oppose a Bill which would propose to hand over all the Parks, under proper regulations, to the proper Local Authorities. I cannot admit that there is the slightest validity in the plea put forward by the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, that there would be difficulty in getting the Bill through the House. He seems to forget that he is a Member of a Government who do not find it difficult to keep 200 or 250 of their followers on the premises, to draw them out of the Smoking Room and the Reading Rooms from time to time, and keep them galloping through the Lobbies in order to pass a Bill without discussion. I think it is the duty of everyone in this Committee to insist that a Division shall be taken, and to insist that this question shall be fully debated, unless we have an undertaking that this system under which London goes sponging upon the whole country to do that which it ought to do itself is to be put a stop to at once for all.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 63; Noes 113: Majority 50.—(Div. List, No. 142.)

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. Maurice Healy

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): Mr. Courtney, I wish to direct the attention of the Government to some of the regulations with regard to coinage. Last month, when the Budget was introduced, I discussed at some length the urgent necessity of restoring our currency to a proper condition. I think I made out a good case for the reform of the Mint regulations, especially with regard to the manufacture and composition of our gold coinage. I think I showed that in these respects we are far behind Germany and other Powers. On that occasion the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), who followed me in the debate, made a most startling proposition. He suggested that we should abolish the half-sovereigns, and replace them by silver, and utilize the profit from the silver for the restoration of the gold coinage. If that proposition had been made by an ordinary private Member, it would have sufficed to say that the public would never consent to part with so useful a coin as the half-sovereign, but a proposal emanating from the late Chancellor of the Exchequer must be more seriously considered. I should like to know if the noble Lord is aware that, at least, £20,000,000 sterling of half-sovereigns circulate in equal legal tender with sovereigns; and I would also point out to him that all gold-using countries use gold coins of the value of 10s., and even less. The United States of America use a two and a half and a one dollar gold piece, although they have one and two dollar notes. Germany coins the ten mark and five mark pieces in gold, although they have there notes of as low a value as five marks. The countries which are comprised in the Latin Union have the ten franc and five franc pieces in gold, worth respectively less than 8s. and 4s. I think that if we had to choose between the retention of sovereigns and half-sovereigns, as a matter of convenience we should retain half-sovereigns, because we might possibly replace the sovereigns in part by £1 notes, and we might pass two half-sovereigns instead of one sovereign. We never can abandon the half-sovereign. I do not think any hon. Gentleman, if he had 6d. to pay, and tendered a sovereign in payment, would care to receive in change so much silver as 19s. 6d. In this country we used to have smaller gold coins than the half-sovereign; we had a third of a guinea, worth 7s., and a quarter of a guinea, worth 5s. 3d. I do not recommend that we should have gold coins smaller than half-sovereigns, on account of the cost of their wear and tear. When the noble Lord suggests that we should replace the £20,000,000 sterling worth of half-sovereigns by silver, does he recollect that half-sovereigns have a full legal tender, whereas the silver tokens would only be a legal tender to the amount of 40s.? The noble Lord suggested we might make a large profit. Certainly we might make a profit of £5,000,000 sterling, but it would not be honestly made. The worst possible mode of raising money would be the depreciation of the coinage circulating in the country. The original intention was that we should circulate silver at the moderate premium of 10 per cent, not to make money by it, but in order to retain it in the country. If the noble Lord's suggestion were adopted, our Government would appear as the purchaser of something like £14,000,000 or £15,000,000 worth of silver. That would be very welcome in the silver market; but there would be a competition between Germany, the United States, and France as to which of them should supply us with the silver and take away our gold in exchange. Each of these countries have more silver to spare than this; and such a transaction as that, without an International Convention, would certainly be more dangerous to this country than any introduction of International bi-metallism, because, when the exchange had been made, there would be no greater stability for silver. We should be encumbered with a large amount of token money, which would embarrass and inconvenience our public; we should certainly have in that case much more silver in currency than if we had International bi-metallism. I will, however, pass from that subject, and suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) that we might permit the Mint to coin a British trade dollar; that the Mint should be allowed to coin this dollar at the expense of those who sent in the silver. This British trade dollar should be a legal tender, concurrently with the Mexican dollar in the Straits Settlement and Hong Kong. It should have impressed upon it some permanent emblem, such as St. George and the Dragon or Britannia, so that there should be no necessity to change the die. The advantage is self-evident. We should no longer be dependent upon foreign Mints for the currency in our own Colonies. The French have coined a large quantity of French trade dollars, and the Germans are likely to follow suit. We should then be at a great disadvantage. We know that trade generally follows the flag, and we also know that the prestige and power of a country are typified in the eyes of Natives of the East by the coins of that Power which circulate. Therefore, I trust that this small facility, which will certainly help the trade of the East, may be permitted, especially as it will be no expense to the Exchequer. I would like to refer very briefly to another very important subject, and that is, whether the time has not yet arrived when we should introduce into this country a decimal coinage? Hon. Members may be surprised to learn that every foreign country in the world possesses a decimal currency, and that it has been a benefit to the people, while we, with our insular prejudices, are left high and dry, and a good many of our Colonies with us. It can hardly be possible, in a matter of convenience in the coinage circulation, that all the world should be wrong, and that we alone should be right. This is not a new question. It was agitated something like 30 years ago. I took part in that agitation; and, therefore, I may, perhaps, be justified in speaking of it now. I believe a Resolution in favour of the introduction of a decimal system was passed in this House, and that there was a Report in its favour from a Committee. The question, however, was, as usual, shelved by a Royal Commission. It may be asked, whether there are any better prospects now than there were formerly for the adoption of a decimal coinage? I think there are much better prospects, because, not so long ago as 30 years, nor as 20 years, many of the Great Powers had not adopted a decimal coinage. Some of our Colonies, even, possess a decimal coinage—Canada, Ceylon, and the Mauritius. It must be remembered that of all the foreign countries and our Colonies which have adopted the decimal coinage not one has endeavoured to retrace the step. Another argument in favour of the proposal is that since 1870

the education of the working classes has been very much improved, and they could now much more readily understand the slight change which would have to be made than they could formerly. Moreover, it is a grave question for the Government whether they should compel the children in board schools to learn so useless a study as compound arithmetic. If we adopted a decimal currency I am informed that a saving of six months would be effected in the education of every child in this country. What I propose is that we retain almost every one of our existing coins. That we should retain the sovereign, divided into 1,000 milles; the half-sovereign, divided into 500 milles; the crown, divided into 250 milles; the half-crown, divided into 125 milles; the florin, divided into 100 milles; the shilling, divided into 50 milles; the sixpence, divided into 25 milles; then we should have a dime, representing 10 milles; a half-dime, representing 5 milles; and a new farthing or mille. You see only three new coins are needed to complete our decimal system. We could retain all our present coins in circulation, and that would do away with the objection with regard to the purchase of stamps, newspapers, &c., with pence and half-pence. In order, if you wish, to prepare the way for the introduction eventually of the four mille and two mille copper pieces, you might permit the French two sou and the sou to pass as four milles and two milles respectively. You have already stopped the importation of the French coins which were passed here with 5 per cent profit; but if you adopt my suggestion, and allow French copper pieces to pass as four milles and two milles, there would be no possibility of French coins being imported unduly, and you might produce a kind of Anglo-French currency—an International arrangement which later on might lead to much better things. I brought this decimal coinage question before the London Chamber of Commerce, who passed my resolution with but one dissentient. Since then at least 14 Provincial Chambers of Commerce have sent in their approval of decimalizing the pound sterling, and I feel quite sure that the movement will spread. I trust the Government will adopt my suggestions which I have so briefly made. They are the outcome of 40 years' experience in all kinds of currencies. I do not think the Government need force a decimal currency upon the public, but permit it to be adopted by completing our decimal question by issuing the three coins I have mentioned. The merchants and bankers and all those members of the different Chambers of Commerce would take up the movement; they would show the Government and the public how welcome would be the change—a change which, I think, would certainly facilitate our commerce in every shape and way. If the Government were to refer the matter to a Select Committee, I feel sure my proposal would meet with approval at the hands of such a Committee, because its adoption would not only facilitate commerce, but also facilitate the education of our young people, and also prepare the way, later on, for a much larger and a very necessary reform—that is, a reform in our weights and measures.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): This is an extremely complicated question to deal with upon the charge for the Mint. My hon. Friend the Member for the Whitechapel Division of the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Montagu) very justly claims to have very great experience on this matter; but I confess I consider it open to question whether the present is a proper time to discuss matters of currency ranging from £1 notes and half-sovereigns to the new coins which he has described. The hon. Member wishes to open up the subject of a decimal coinage, and he has spoken of the decision which has been arrived at by the London Chamber of Commerce upon this matter. I shall have the honour of receiving a deputation from the London Chamber of Commerce with regard to a decimal coinage in the course of a few weeks, and I should prefer to reserve any remarks that I may have to make upon the subject until I have heard it discussed by the members of the London Chamber of Commerce and the representatives of other Chambers. As at present advised, I must admit that it would be with very great hesitation that I should approach any question of changing the coinage of this country. If there is one thing upon which the general public is extremely sensitive it is upon questions of alterations of the rates of coinage and weights and measures, and the general arrangements of commerce to which they have been accustomed. I can fancy that excellent scientific arguments could be urged on behalf of the views of my hon. Friend; but when you come to practical dealing with this matter, I cannot conceive anything which would more disturb the general feelings of the public with regard to the currency than the introduction of a number of new coins, whether they are four milles, or two milles, or eight milles, or whatever name may be given to them. This is essentially one of those questions upon which it appears to me that theory and practice are at variance. According to theory, decimal coinage is excellent, and mathematicians—in and out of this House—are naturally enthusiastic on behalf of such a simple measure; but I believe that the great bulk of the traders of this country, and especially of small traders, and the bulk of the purchasing and selling public, would be adverse to any changes which would disturb the general measure of value to which they are accustomed. And I doubt whether the convenience of the great merchants and bankers, and the international traders generally, which would be furthered by the adoption of the views of the hon. Gentleman would be sufficient compensation for the great disturbance which would be introduced into the general trade. I am aware of the great progress which has been made in decimal and fractional calculations by the action of the schools; but, nevertheless, I think that to introduce a new system of calculation would be a most hazardous measure. It is only the respect which is due to the hon. Member who has introduced this subject to the Committee this evening which has induced me to anticipate what I would rather have reserved until I had heard the views of the Chambers of Commerce on the question of the currency. I think I have intimated to my hon. Friend that the large question of £1 notes and the general revision of the coinage from the point of view of light gold and defaced silver, and from the point of view of various reforms which may have to be introduced, are occupying the attention of the Government in a very serious manner. I am grateful to the hon. Member for the valuable contributions he makes on this subject, both publicly and privately. I shall be always happy to receive any suggestion he may make; but I trust he will excuse me from giving any premature declaration upon any of these extremely important questions affecting the coinage of the country.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Mr. Courtney, I wish to say a few words upon Vote 2, Class 2—House of Commons Offices. I desire to bring under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) a matter which was raised some years ago, and that is the extremely defective library accommodation in this House. As I understand, the arrangements of the Library of this House are under an old understanding left in the hands of the Speaker; but what I and others desire is, that they should be entrusted to a Committee, as the Kitchen arrangements are left to a Kitchen Committee. The space in the Library is entirely insufficient, more especially since the numbers in constant attendance on the House have largely increased. Again, complaint is very properly made of the insufficient supply of books.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The question of the physical accommodation in the Library and of the Library management comes under Vote 4, Class 1. Though the words, "House of Commons Offices" are used here, the item refers to the personnel of the House—to the pay of the officers.

MR. DILLON: I will not refer any further to the physical accommodation of the Library. On examining the Civil Service Estimates, I came to the conclusion that the best Vote, or the only Vote, upon which I could raise the question of the purchase of books and the arrangements of the rooms in the Library was the Vote for the Speaker's Department. I find that the Vote for that Department includes allowances for the librarian, assistant librarian, and all the assistants in the Library, and I made inquiry the other day, and the librarian informed me that the purchase of books, and, in fact, all the arrangements of the Library were directly under the control of the Speaker, and belonged to the Speaker's Department. I may have been misinformed. I am anxious to get opinion from the First Commissioner of Works.

Mr. Goschen

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no doubt the question of the management of the Library and the purchase of books might be discussed on the Vote including the salary for the librarian.

MR. DILLON: The chief point I wish to bring under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman is that, in my opinion, the management of the Library ought to be entrusted to a Committee of the House, just as the Kitchen arrangements are, so that any suggestions as to alterations as to the Library accommodation, or the purchase or supply of books, could be directly made to a Committee which would represent all the sections of the House. I do not intend to press this matter at any length to-night; but I thought I would give notice to the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works that I will raise the question at a later stage.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): I should like to explain to the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) that I cannot answer with authority on this question, because it does not come within my Department at all. So far as my knowledge goes, this is the first time the suggestion has been made. No doubt the authorities who are responsible for the matter will consider what he has proposed, whether they agree with it ultimately or not. I wish the hon. Gentleman, however, to understand that I have no authority whatever in the matter.

MR. W. H. JAMES (Gateshead): Mr. Courtney, this is a Vote which makes provision for the salaries of officials of the Colonial Office, and, therefore, I am anxious to address a few observations to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) with reference to some matters in a distant part of the world in regard to which I have put a few Questions to him at various intervals since the commencement of the Session. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that I do not make these observations with any desire to be hostile to him or the Government. My observations will relate to the religious persecutions in the Island of Tonga, which have attracted very considerable attention in religious Bodies, and in certain sections of the Press. Now, the right hon. Gentleman stated to me the other night that he had received a telegraphic summary of the Report which Sir Charles Mitchell has forwarded to the Government. I do not wish for a moment that the right hon. Gentleman should prejudge the question, or come to any hasty decision upon the very brief summary which Sir Charles Mitchell has telegraphed home. But this matter is not a new one to the Colonial Office. I think, so far back as the year 1883, Sir George W. Des Vœux, who was at that time Governor at Fiji, and I think, anterior to that date, Sir Arthur Gordon had called attention to the religious persecutions which existed in the Island of Tonga. Tonga is under the control nominally of King George, who is upwards of 80 years of age; but I think it will be admitted from the Reports in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman from those who are acquainted with the affairs of the Island, that this man is perfectly incompetent to form any opinion on any question whatever. The de facto Governor of Tonga is an ex-Wesleyan minister, a certain Mr. Shirley Baker, and he has been of late years complete and absolute Sovereign of the Island. Mr. Baker some years ago had a dispute with the Wesleyan Church, and he seems to have betaken himself to Tonga, and there to have set up a rival church. Mr. Baker is a man of very considerable wealth, and very great ability, and of absolutely no scruples; and I confess that the sort of proceedings which have disgraced, and do still disgrace, affairs in that Island, appear to me, so long as they are allowed to remain in their present form, a disgrace and blot upon the British name. Sir Charles Mitchell telegraphs that the statements as to these persecutions are to a very considerable extent true. So far from thinking that they have been exaggerated I believe they have been understated, and that when the whole facts of these deplorable outrages—these disgraceful and horrible outrages—are known, it will be found that the annals of religious persecutions for several centuries past will scarcely afford a parallel for anything that has occurred in Tonga. I am anxious to address the right hon. Gentleman, however, as to one particular point. Mr. Shirley Baker, who is an extremely subtle and able person, has succeeded in ingratiating himself by various methods with foreign interests.

I am anxious to ask my right hon. Friend that when Sir Charles Mitchell's Report is received he will consider it entirely upon its own merits and in its own interests. It appears to me that if we are a great country we should not in any way recognize or support the terrible state of things which has gone on in Tonga for the last four or five years. The Pacific Islanders Protection Act, which, in its very nature, is one of the most drastic Acts which has ever been passed by the English Legislature gives very considerable powers in the Western Pacific to Her Majesty's High Commissioner. I believe it is quite within the power of the High Commissioner to deport this de facto Governor to some other portion of Her Majesty's Dominions, and, if it does not absolutely give the power of deporting this man, so serious have been the outrages, the murders, the floggings and cruelties that Her Majesty's Government would be perfectly justified, in my opinion, in taking this de facto Governor to some portions of the Queen's Dominions where he might be tried and made amenable for these terrible offences. I hope I may have some assurances from the right hon. Gentleman that when the Report comes to him he will consider it strictly upon its own merits, and that he will not be involved in other entanglements. I cannot believe that any foreign Power will be anxious in any way to identify itself with the outrages which have been perpetrated, and which are going on now; and I believe that our taking the lead in such a course and line as I have suggested, so far from being disadvantageous to our interests with other Powers, would be distinctly to our interests. I am quite willing to acknowledge that the right hon. Gentleman is anxious to do what is proper and just, and I only make these observations in the hope that I may be able to strengthen his hands in the course he may take. I assure him very considerable interest will be taken by the religious bodies who have been identified with missionary work in the Western Pacific in the course he takes.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): I am not at all disposed to dispute the facts stated by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. H. James). I have only to say, that the information with regard to the alleged outrages that we have is the same of which the hon. Member himself is possessed; but I should like to assure the Committee that Her Majesty's Government are fully alive, and have been fully alive, to the importance of this subject. The moment we received any Report of these outrages Sir Charles Mitchell was telegraphed to go to Tonga. He arrived there on the 27th of March, and reported that the King afforded him every facility to make inquiries, and all was quiet. The proceedings had then ceased, and the British interests, so far as we learned, were not affected by the recent events. I may add, that to secure a more searching inquiry, and that all legal questions should be thoroughly discussed, Sir Charles Mitchell took with him Mr. Clark, who is Chief Judicial Commissioner under the Pacific Acts. Then we come to the telegram of the 30th April, to which the hon. Member has referred, and which, I admit, is to a certain extent unsatisfactory. Perhaps, for the information of hon. Members who did not hear me read the telegram the other day I had better read it again. It is—

"April 30.—Returned from Tonga to-day. Send report by next mail. Full inquiry showed report of religious persecution true to a considerable extent. King promises make chiefs observe constitution as regards religious freedom in future and generally protect Wesleyans. All quiet now. Europeans in no case interfered with."

The hon. Member has referred to the Pacific Islanders Protection Acts. Now, the power under which the Chief Commissioner acts, and especially the power to which he referred, the power of deportation, is given under the Western Pacific Order in Council. There is no doubt under that Order in Council the High Commissioner has power in certain cases, and one of those cases is, if a British subject is likely to be dangerous to the peace and good order of the Island, to order a British subject to remove himself, and if he does not leave, the High Commissioner has power to deport him. I need hardly say that it would not have been right for Her Majesty's Government, when instructing Sir Charles Mitchell to go out to Tonga, without a full knowledge of the facts, to order him to remove or deport Mr. Baker; and I may also say there is not much encouragement to the High Commissioner to deport a man, because during Sir Arthur Gordon's time a man named Hunt was deported, and this man afterwards proceeded against the High Commissioner, and succeeded in his action. I believe he succeeded on a technical point, but still what occurred does not offer much encouragement to a High Commissioner to put into use the power of deportation. The hon. Gentleman asked me a specific question, to which I can give him an unhesitating answer. He asked me whether the Report of Sir Charles Mitchell would be considered on its own merits. I can assure him without hesitation that that will be the case. So far as I know, it is not likely that any foreign Power will interfere with our discretion in the matter; but I can assure him that the Report will be considered most carefully. Her Majesty's Government are fully alive to the importance of the question, and will take such steps as they may be advised to take on the Report. Of course, the hon. Member cannot expect me to say more until we have received from Sir Charles Mitchell his Report. I hope the hon. Member will regard my answer as satisfactory.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I should like to revert to the subject which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon). It has been pointed out previously that the librarians to the House of Lords have residences granted them. I think that if hon. Members will take into account the duties which are discharged by the librarians of the two Houses, they will acknowledge that there is no comparison between their respective duties. The librarians of the House of Commons have to do considerably more than the librarians of the House of Lords; we sit very much longer, and the Members attending this House are more numerous than those attending the House of Lords. I think it will be generally admitted that our librarians give satisfaction to all Members of the House, no matter to what Party they belong; and I think they ought to receive as much consideration as the librarians of the other House. While I am upon my feet, I should like to refer to the way in which the news room is managed. I think that the Party to which I belong have something to complain of in this matter. We maintain that every section of Members in this House have weekly or monthly periodicals taken for their special reading, whereas we have nothing whatever of the kind. When the Irish Nationalist Party numbered 85 we thought, certainly, it was time some action should be taken in this matter, and I wrote to the gentleman in charge of the news room directing his attention to the matter. I did so without any consultation with my Colleagues; but I thought I expressed my views on the subject. I certainly think that when any large section of Members read a certain organ, that organ should be taken in the news room. With that view, and when the Irish Parliamentary Party assumed its present proportions, I wrote to the Serjeant-at-Arms asking him to take in the news room an Irish paper—United Ireland was the paper to which I referred, a paper which, though it may not be approved by hon. Members opposite, is a paper of which we approve, and which we largely read. The reply I received was as follows:—

"Sir,—I have given your suggestion my best consideration, but I regret to have to say that I have so much reason to believe that the laying of United Ireland on the table of the news room would cause such dissatisfaction among the Members that I do not feel justified in ordering it.—I remain, yours faithfully, H. D. ESKIN."

To that letter I replied—

"I regret to learn that the suggestion which I made in regard to placing United Ireland on the table of the news room does not meet with your approval. I thought the wishes of the 86 Members of the Irish Parliamentary Party might have influenced you in arriving at a different decision. I have no doubt that some hon. Members might be dissatisfied at seeing United Ireland in the reading-room, but I may point out that at present illustrated papers and other periodicals are taken which are grossly offensive to 86 Members of the House of Commons."

Well, Sir, the matter has remained there since; but I think it is a proper question to ask whether the Irish Members are supposed to stand on a par with the rest of the Members of the House of Commons. I think that if we look to the action of this House we are not considered to stand on a par with the rest of hon. Members. I maintain that if 86 Members coming from any part of the country read a certain paper, and wish that paper to be taken in the news room their wishes should be acceded to. I am perfectly well aware that in giving the answer he did to my suggestion the Serjeant-at-Arms only expressed the opinion of the majority of this House; but I do not think anyone will contend that the majority of this House is actuated by any fair motives towards Ireland or the Irish Representatives. Their conduct in the last few days shows that in any matters in which Irishmen are concerned they take little or no interest. I do not suppose that my raising this question now will materially alter the case; I suspect that United Ireland will not be taken in the news room; but it is as well to point out that day by day and week by week we have garbled extracts from United Ireland in the London papers. If we have these garbled extracts put before us it is only fair that the whole of the articles should be placed at the disposal of Members in order that they may arrive at the real effect of them. Let me say that before communicating with the Serjeant-at-Arms I had no previous communication with Mr. W. O'Brien, the editor of United Ireland, who, the Committee will perhaps be glad to hear, was elected to-day for the Eastern Division of Cork without any opposition. Well, Mr. Courtney, United Ireland appears to be a very objectionable organ to hon. Gentlemen opposite; but we have other organs in Ireland, The Nation, for instance, and we certainly submit that some such paper should be placed at the disposal of the 86 Irish Members. I am not certain that many hon. Members would read these organs as well as ourselves, but notwithstanding that I maintain that it is only right that some such paper should be taken in our news room. Are we or are we not to be placed on a par with the other Members of the House of Commons? Is it because we cannot roll up to the House in our carriages that we are to be treated in a different mode to other Members?

Mr. FINCH-HATTON (Lincolnshire, Spalding): Mr. Courtney, I am very glad to find myself for once in agreement with hon. Members below the Gangway opposite, and I should be very glad indeed if United Ireland were taken in our news room, and if it were always placed side by side with The Times. I think it would perhaps be as well if the back numbers of United Ireland were also taken and placed alongside The Times.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): No doubt several hon. Members opposite would have their patience severely tried by the presence of United Ireland in the Reading Room; but we might hope that the adoption of my hon. Friend's suggestion would have the effect of bringing about their conversion. Hon. Members opposite would probably take example by our good temper under provocation, and seeing that we are able philosophically to bear the presence of The Times, and other antagonistic newspapers, in the Reading Room they would be able to bear with the presence of United Ireland and The Nation. I think the suggestion of the hon. Member for East Mayo is an admirable one. Everyone in the habit of using the Library must at times have found great difficulty in getting the books they require. It is not in the power of the Library officials to do more than a certain amount of work, the Department being, in my opinion, greatly undermanned. I hope the Committee will take into consideration the suggestions which have been made, particularly that of the hon. Member for East Waterford (Mr. P. J. Power), and that in the future we shall not have reason to complain of one-sided arrangements in the Library.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I should like to direct the attention of the Committee to an important Vote which occurs somewhat lower down in the Paper for the Office of Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland. It is a matter that I deeply complain of, that in relation to the discharge of that extraordinary Office—[interruption]. Before I come to the case of the complaint which we the Members of the Irish Party have against the holder of the Office of Chief Secretary for Ireland, the most responsible of all the Offices that go to form the Government of this country, I wish to call attention to a few minor details. In the first place, it will be in the recollection of the Committee, that when the late Under Secretary for Ireland, Sir Robert Hamilton, accepted the post of Under Secretary he stipulated—or, on account of his distinguished position in the Civil Service, it was agreed—that the salary which had from time immemorial been attached to the Under Secretaryship should be raised from £2,000 to £2,500 per annum, but it was stated that this should be a purely personal rise, to continue only so long as Sir Robert Hamilton should retain the post and should not permanently attach to the office, and in the Estimates from that day to this there is always a note appended to the charge for the Under Secretary for Ireland stating that the sum is a personal charge. Well, the charge in the Estimates for 1887-8—and I will ask the Committee to notice that no part of this year has or will Sir Robert Hamilton be Under Secretary for Ireland—is £2,500, though there is the usual note appended stating that this salary is personal. Personal to whom? It was personal to Sir Robert Hamilton; but how is it personal to the present holder of the Office? It is a thing very often noticed that it is very much easier to raise a salary than to reduce it to its old level, and though, in the present instance, the man on whose account the salary was raised has now gone away, the person who now holds the Office seems to think that he has as good a right to this "personal" salary as had his Predecessor. There appears to be on the face of this Estimate an attempt to smuggle in a permanent increase of £500 a-year into the salary of the Under Secretary for Ireland. It seems to me that the figure at which it has stood for so long—namely, £2,000 a-year is ample. Then there is another minor item to which I would direct attention—namely, the salary of £750 a-year, together with an item of £800 a-year for journeys between Dublin and London for an individual connected with the Irish establishment, called a draftsman to the Irish Government. I want to know who that man is, and what he does? If the work he has done has been drafting of the Crimes Bill we can take the authority of The Times newspaper as to the character of the work; but my impression is that the drafting of that and other Irish Bills is all done by the draftsman of the Government in London. It would seem from the large amount charged for travelling expenses between Dublin and London, that this individual lives perpetually in the train, and is constantly on the journey either from Dublin to London or from London to Dublin. He spent no less than £800 on railway fares and cabs. Will the Government give us some information as to who this man is, and what his work consists of, and why it is necessary for him to spend £800 in travelling when he already enjoys a salary of £750? These, Sir, are minor items, and there seems to be a considerable amount of waste upon them. There is another item to which I would call attention, and which appears to me to be remarkably absurd. We know that the Chief Secretary for Ireland enjoys a salary of £4,000, and that he has a very handsome residence in the Phoenix Park in Dublin with a handsome demesne attached for his enjoyment. Altogether I think that he is very handsomely compensated for his services. But he has now added to all this £425 a-year for coal. Surely, Sir, he must be the coldest man alive if he wants to burn £425 worth of coal for the year in Ireland, seeing that he has been about three days out of the year in that country. I will leave it to the imaginations of hon. Members what fires he must keep up during the short time he is in Ireland. Now, I trust we shall have some explanation of these items of expenditure before the Committee votes the money. Of course all these are minor matters, and I shall now go to the question which really induced me to rise and trespass at some length on the time of the Committee, and that is a question as to the manner in which the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant has discharged the duties for which he draws this large salary in this House. Sir, we know perfectly well that in the whole experience of the Parliamentary and responsible Governments of the world there does not exist an officer whose responsibilities are so vast and so varied as those of the Irish Chief Secretary. I do not think that there is in any other country, Constitutionally governed, an officer who answers for every single Department of the Government and of the administration of the country as the Irish Chief Secretary does to-day, and has done ever since the Act of Union was passed. Any one who will take the trouble to look back to former investigations into the government of Ireland, and will notice the evidence given by such men as Sir Thomas Drummond when he was examined on this subject, will obtain some interesting information. They will see the duties that men like Sir Thomas Drummond, who applied themselves to perform those duties with a really conscientious spirit, had to perform. They will find detailed in his evidence the duties which the Irish Chief Secretary and the Irish Under Secretary had and have to do, and will admit that the satisfactory discharge of those duties would tax the energies and abilities of the greatest statesmen who have ever been at the disposal of any Government. But, Sir, even the multiplicity of the duties that the Chief Secretary is supposed to perform in Ireland are certainly not in excess, in point of weight, to the responsibilities which he bears in this House. In this House he is responsible for everything that occurs in Ireland. Whereas in this country a number of different Ministers divide the various Departments of the administration amongst them, in Ireland the Chief Secretary must answer for everything. But that is not all, because in this country a great deal of the government is carried on, I might say, spontaneously. The demands on the Executive, as we know, and as the country is beginning to know, are infinitely simpler and more easily managed than are those demands with regard to Ireland, where you have a centralized system of bureaucratic administration trying to govern a people who are out of sympathy with their governors. The difficulties of government are increased in a case of the kind ten-fold from what they are in a country like this. What has been the course that has been adopted now for years by the Ministers of this and the Government of this country in dealing with this problem of providing a man, who, by his knowledge and acquaintance with the circumstances of Ireland, as well as by his ability, is able to bear this load of responsibility and discharge all these multifarious duties in a satisfactory way? We, the Irish Representatives, remember the expression of O'Connell, when he was describing Irish Secretaries. We remember O'Connell's saying that he could in no way describe them so well as by comparing them to "shave beggars." We know how he explained that phrase. The men who carried on the barber's trade, whenever a man came along who appeared too poor to pay, set aside an apprentice to shave him. That is the way in which the Irish have been governed. Men have been set apart to try their 'prentice hands in the art of statesmanship upon that which is really the most difficult and tangled problem at the disposal of the Government. Our country has suffered enormously through the effects of that practice. In the present instance—in the case of the present Chief Secretary—we can hardly apply to him the epithet that O'Connell applied to the men of his day, inasmuch as he was apprenticed to certain other offices in the State before being sent to Ireland; but the practice in this instance has been hardly less evil than that denounced by O'Connell, for the present Irish Secretary was sent to Ireland for no other reason, that we can discover, except that he excelled almost all other Members of this House in his utter ignorance of that country. And what is the method he has adopted to attempt to extricate himself from the difficulties in which that ignorance necessarily involves him? What is the method he has adopted in order, as it were, to throw some cloak of decency around a state of things which might have seemed ludicrous if it had not been tragical? That a country torn asunder by contending factions, and in a state of the highest fever of political excitement, should be handed over to the control and irresponsible government of a man, who, whatever he may know of the condition of Scotland, where he was born, I suppose, or, at least, the country where he owns property, or whatever he knows of the condition of this country, where he has served as a statesman for some years, who knows nothing of Ireland, is ludicrous. Here you have the government of Ireland handed over to a man who knows absolutely nothing about that country, and whose whole experience of it since he undertook to govern it was gained by a visit of three days, during which time, we are told, he dined with Lord Ardilaun, and interviewed Sir Arthur Guinness.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): That is not the fact.

MR. DILLON: I am glad to hear it. All I can is that it was stated in the newspapers. I have no other means of knowing the motions of Irish Chief Secretaries except what is stated in the newspapers. We, in Ireland, do not go near the Castle—at any rate, any man who values his good name does not go near the Castle—I have never crossed the threshold of that building, nor have I ever gone near its doors. [Laughter.] Hon. Members think this a matter for laughter; but I put it to every intelligent man in this House, is that a condition of things under which you expect a country to be governed decently—I put it to every reasoning man, is it a satisfactory condition of things, so far as good government is concerned, that you find that every man who values the goodwill of the people of Ireland does not dare to set his foot in the establishment where the Government is carried on? I say that that is a state of things which seems to bring government to a reductio ad absurdum. It is no wonder, therefore, that I make some mistakes in dealing with the movements of the Chief Secretary in Ireland. At any rate, the Chief Secretary does not deny my statement when I say that his experience of the country he is engaged in governing has been limited to a visit of three days. I suppose he felt that the situation in which he was placed was an anomalous one. He found himself standing up at that Table day after day to answer Questions affecting various departments of the administration of the law in Ireland and to answer men who knew what they were asking about, and men who were instructed by their constituents to ask the Questions; he read out at that Table written answers which were put into his hands by the officials whose conduct and administration we were impugning; and when we asked him any Questions as to the correctness of these statements, we found that we might as well have questioned him on the principles of the Chinese language and the philosophy of Confucius. We found that he had no knowledge outside the written documents which were placed in his hands. I doubt whether he knows anything about the geography of the country. I should be pleased to form one of a Committee, as this seems to be a time for the appointment of Committees of Inquiry, in order to cross-examine the Irish Chief Secretary with regard to the geography of Ireland. I have not the slightest doubt but I should be able to puzzle him in the course of a quarter of an hour. That being the condition of affairs, the right hon. Gentleman cast his eyes around for some Irishman whom he could take into his confidence. He cast about for some Gentleman whose knowledge would be a cloak for his own ignorance, and at last he met with the Gentleman; and, in my opinion, he has jumped from the frying-pan into the fire. For, bad as was the knowledge of Irish affairs of the right hon. Gentleman, I cannot for a moment doubt that he has not in the least improved his position by adding to his counsels and sharing his responsibilities with one of the most notorious and admitted champions of Orangeism and landlord oppression to be found in Ireland. The time has come to declare on behalf of the people whom we are sent to represent that a more scandalous mockery of Representative Government has never been enacted in this House even on Irish questions, than to see day after day at that Table rise and answer our Questions—Questions that mostly have to deal with the condition of the farmers in Ireland, and the whole administration of the law as affecting rent and the position of tenants—a Gentleman who has no acknowledged political position, who has himself, as much as any man in Ireland, brought about the condition of things which renders this interrogation necessary, and whose relations with his tenants will not bear investigation, as the result of the inquiries of the Sub-Commissioners appointed by the Government of this country abundantly testifies, and who, if there was any decency left in the Irish Government, would be one of the last men on their side whom they would ask to stand up there and answer Questions affecting rents and the administration of the law in regard to Irish tenants. Now, I think we are entitled to demand from this House, and to demand of the Unionist Members of this House, whether, in their opinion, we are being fairly treated as Representatives of the people of Ireland—considering this subject from the Unionist point of view—when we are asked to take our answers from this Gentleman? We know what the system has become; the Irish Secretary never deigns to walk into the House until the Questions are answered, and we are asked to accept, as bearing upon the whole administration of Ireland, the statements of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman), who fled from Ireland—I am now speaking in a political sense—because he knew he could not get a seat south of the Boyne, and, indeed, I doubt very much whether he could have got a seat north of the Boyne either. The time, I think, has come when this question must be fully discussed, and I shall be very much surprised and disappointed if some Unionist Member does not get up in this House and give us the benefit of his opinion on this question. I shall be very much surprised if some one of them does not get up and tell us whether it is, or is not, his opinion that the future government of Ireland ought to be managed in this manner. If they are brave men, let them get up and make some declaration; if they are not brave men, let them remain silent. We, in Ireland, are entitled to say, and we shall say—“This is what you call Unionism and fair play to the people of Ireland, when the whole administration of Ireland shall be explained and expounded by an Irish rack-renting landlord, who is a staunch friend of the Orange Society—by a man whose rents have been shorn down by one half by your own Commissioners, and by a man who is threatened from day to day by a strike amongst his own tenantry!” We do not know at what moment the man standing at that Table to expound the principles of the Irish Government, and who is responsible for the proceedings of the Irish Government, will not be in collision with his own tenantry, whom the record of your own Commissioners show to be virtually in the right whilst he is altogether in the wrong. We are accused of personalities. [“Hear, hear!”] Yes; I like to anticipate that argument. But, I would ask, how can we avoid being personal? I would ask, why did you put this Gentleman in this position? Do you mean that a man is to be made a Governor in a country, and to be given a potential voice in the management of the affairs of any country in a time like this, and that we are to be debarred from criticizing his antecedents and character? I do not wish to criticize his private character; but his dealings with his tenants, now that he is a Member of the Government, are no longer entitled to the cloak of privacy that usually covers a man’s private affairs. When a gentleman takes an official post like that of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, his dealings with his tenantry become matter of public interest. When a right hon. and gallant Gentleman places himself in this position, I say it is legitimate and fair argument on our part to discuss his dealings with his tenantry as we are discussing them; and I contend that the records of the late Commission show that it was a shameless act on the part of the Government to place this Gentleman in a responsible position in connection with the Government of Ireland. I do not know that I need speak at length on this point. I do not think there is a Member of this House now listening to me who does not agree with me in his heart. I do not believe that there is a Conservative opposite me who does not believe that it was a deadly mistake for the Government to put by the side of the Chief Secretary for Ireland in the management of Irish affairs in this House a man whose dealings with his tenantry your own Blue Book shows to be so questionable. Why did not the Government put down a Vote for this Gentleman in the Estimates? Why did they not challenge the opinion of the House before they entered upon this course? So far as my limited knowledge of Parliamentary proceedings goes, the course they have taken in regard to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's appointment is entirely unprecedented—that is to say, the course of nominating to the most responsible position in the Government—for the moment I know of no more responsible position than that which has to do with the government of Ireland—a Gentleman who has no salary, and whose nomination is thereby withdrawn from the control of Parliament and from criticism—or almost withdrawn from Parliamentary criticism—and is discussed, I may almost say, by the toleration of the Chair—I believe it to be almost unprecedented that they should create this Office, and put this right hon. and gallant Gentleman in his present position, without sending him back to his constituency, and without challenging the decision of Parliament; and I believe that by that action the Government have plainly indicated to this House and the country that they were ashamed to face debate on the character of this appointment. I do not propose, at this stage, to take up the time of the Committee any longer upon this matter; but, in my opinion, it would be impossible to exaggerate the difficulty that will arise if the Government persist in carrying on the present system of replying to Irish Questions through the mouth of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet. I do not think that they could adopt a method of striking a heavier blow at the Union between the two countries. [Laughter.] Hon. Members are perfectly at liberty to laugh, because I tell them honestly that I was extremely pleased at this appointment. It is the most stupid thing that an English Government ever did—an English Government whose desire is to maintain the Union; and I warn the Government that while we shall continue, on every occasion, to protest against the appointment, I, for my own part, was rejoiced that they made the appointment, and shall not be a bit sorry if they stick to it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As the attack which the hon. Gentleman has just made is upon the Chief Secretary and the Under Secretary, perhaps my hon. Friend who rose from the Bench behind me will allow me to interpose for a few minutes between him and the Committee. Before I go to the main body of the speech of the hon. Member opposite, perhaps I may allude to the subject which he began with, which had reference, if I recollect rightly, to the question of the salary of the present Permanent Under Secretary for Ireland? He told us that the salary of the late Permanent Under Secretary had been raised from £2,000 to £2,500 per annum on personal grounds; that those personal grounds had been continued to the present holder of the Office, and he asked for an explanation of the fact. Well, I may remind the hon. Gentleman that the present holder of the Office (Sir Redvers Buller) accepted the post very reluctantly on grounds of public duty, and not as a permanent appointment which he was going to hold for a great length of time, and that the salary is as personal to him as it was to his predecessor, and will not fail to be revised when the time comes for Sir Redvers Buller to retire. Then the hon. Gentleman went on to say that I did not earn the liberal salary which he seems to think I receive. I cannot help thinking that, through the whole of his speech, the hon. Gentleman seemed very hard to please. There are now two officials in this House responsible for the conduct of Irish affairs. There is the right hon.

and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet. ["No, no!"] They object to me because I have too big a salary, and they object to my right hon. and gallant Friend because he has no salary at all; they object to me because I know too little of Ireland, and they object to my right hon. and gallant Friend because he knows too much of Ireland. I do not know how we can ever succeed in striking a happy mean that will satisfy the fastidious tastes of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Then the hon. Gentleman reproached me with having been only four days—

MR. DILLON: No; three.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think he was wrong in his three. If I recollect rightly, I have been about a week there; but I will not quarrel over hours with him. The hon. Gentleman reproached me with having been only a few days in Ireland since I was appointed to my present Office. The hon. Gentleman forgets that my presence has, unfortunately, been required in this House almost continuously since that time. He complained bitterly that I am not here every day to answer Questions; but I want to know, if my absence for that short hour in the evening is so bitterly resented by the hon. Gentleman, how it would be possible for me, consistently with the limitation that regulates all one's movements—namely, of being able only to be in one place at a time—to be in Ireland and in my place in this House to carry on the serious duties that fall to my Office at the same time? I must say that the hon. Gentleman was a little hard on me in that respect. He began by criticizing the amount of the salary that the Chief Secretary receives; and having begun in that way he went on to say that, not only in this country, but throughout the civilized globe, there was not a single official who had placed on his shoulders duties of so difficult, delicate, and responsible a character as mine. I began to think, when I heard the hon. Gentleman make these remarks, that I was the least paid official in this country, and I fully expected him to finish his speech by a Motion to the effect that the salary should at least be doubled. Then the hon. Gentleman went on to attack me for not being in my place to answer Questions. [An hon. MEMBER: Coals!] When I occupy my present post through the winter, as

I hope to do, I shall be able to give the hon. Gentleman some information in regard to that particular item of my salary. At present I have no information as to the amount of coal which is required to be burned in the Chief Secretary's lodge. He complained of my not being in my place to answer Questions, and he said that it was perfectly necessary that I should be in my place at Question time, because Questions of great importance were asked, chiefly with regard to delicate and important controversies between landlords and tenants. Well, Sir, when he made that remark I took up the Order Paper for to-day, which I had not seen up to that moment, and glanced at the Questions, which I had not had an opportunity of looking at. [Ironical cheers.] Well, Questions I was under no necessity of looking at, because the duty of replying to them was undertaken by my right hon. and gallant Friend. I have looked through them, and I find that there were altogether 13 Questions asked of the Department over which I preside. I see that the first Question relates to the appointment of a monitor for the Annadown National School, County Down; the second Question refers to a new Loan Fund recently established at Ederney, County Fermanagh, on the application of a parish priest, and as to whether there is a Loan Fund at Kesh, two miles and five furlongs from Ederney, and another at Lack, three miles and four furlongs from the same; and whether these Loan Funds do or do not come up to the proper regulations? Question No. 3 relates to the grounds upon which the Board of National Education made an order in February altering the status of the workmistress of the Aughiogan National School, County Tyrone; No. 4 relates to the further examination of a certain Miss Daly, of Milltown, County Tyrone, in view of the fact that her appointment has been already ratified by the Education Board; Question No. 5 relates to a line of tramway between Schull and Skibbereen; No. 6 refers to the same tramway line; No. 7 refers to the sanitary arrangements of the Monaghan District Lunatic Asylum—no doubt, a very proper Question; No. 8 has reference to the exclusive right of the ferryage of the Derry Bridge Commissioners across the River Foyle at Derry; No. 9 relates to two large wings of the workhouse at Monaghan, at present occupied by the Monaghan Militia—

Mr. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Question No. 11, to which the right hon. Gentleman refers, deals with the eviction of 65 families by landlords within the Monaghan Union.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I am numbering the Questions myself. Question No. 10 deals with the Return showing the working of the Labourers' Acts (Ireland) Order for April 5, 1887; No. 11 refers to a Resolution of the Granard Guardians, protesting against delay in making a Provisional Order for a scheme of labourers' cottages; No. 12 deals with the reported drunkenness and neglect of duty of one Joseph Watt; and the 13th and last Question is with regard to an assault committed on a warder named M'Connell, in Mountjoy Prison, on the 9th instant, by two convicts.

Mr. CHANCE: Will the right hon. Gentleman give attention to Question No. 11 on the Paper, which he says relates to two large wings of the Monaghan Workhouse, but which really relates to certain landlords within the Monaghan Union having notified the Guardians of their intention to evict 65 families. [A laugh.]

Mr. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): This is no laughing matter.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: No doubt the Question referred indirectly to the eviction of 65 families. I have not had time to look at it very carefully; but it seems to me that what the Question primarily referred to was the accommodation in two wings of the workhouse. The hon. Member appears to think that I am guilty of a great dereliction of the difficult and responsible duties which, at the beginning of his speech, he so eloquently described to us, by not coming down at half-past 4 in the evening and answering these Questions; but I do not care who it is that is Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, whether it is a person as totally ignorant of Irish affairs as the hon. Gentleman says I am—I do not know why he said that, because, though it is true that since I have been appointed Chief Secretary I have not spent a long time in Ireland, still the hon. Member will recollect that I have been now some 15 years in Parliament, and during that time I have had the privilege and pleasure of listening to Irishmen for about four hours every night—either I must be very stupid—[An hon. MEMBER: So you are.]—either I must be very stupid, or hon. Members from Ireland must be obscure, if, during these 15 years' experience, I have obtained no knowledge whatever of the country which they so ably represent—I do not care who it is who has to answer Questions of the kind I have described—I do not care who the Chief Secretary is, whether he is as ignorant as I am myself, or whether he has had as intimate and perfect an acquaintance with the affairs of Ireland as had my Predecessor in Office who represents the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), who is so indignant with me, or rather who has criticized, so far as criticism is possible, the conduct I pursued in transferring part of my duties to my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Isle of Thanet—

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I did not express indignation.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, the right hon. Gentleman has criticized, so far as criticism is possible; but I would submit that in dealing with Questions such as the reported drunkenness and neglect of duty of a relieving officer, or an assault committed on a warder in a prison, or the examination of a work-mistress in a National School, whoever answers the Questions can only supply information derived direct from the localities. The official answering is, and must be, simply a means of transferring to Members of this House the information he has derived from the localities; and I venture to think that in the arrangement of Business between my right hon. and gallant Friend and myself, the public suffers no loss by my transferring to him the duty of replying to these Questions. Replying to these Questions takes up about an hour—from about half-past 4 to about half-past 5 o'clock. Suppose 20 Questions are asked of a Chief Secretary—and I think that was about the number the last time I attended to reply to them—it will take, perhaps, three minutes to answer each Question, an hour in all, which is not a very long time. There will be probably about 20 other Questions, so that about two hours are spent every day in replying to these queries, which have not, as a rule, any bearing upon important controversies between landlord and tenant, but which relate solely to small local matters such as I have described. No doubt, they are very proper Questions to be put to the Government; but, at the same time, they are Questions to answer which does not require any very profound knowledge of the country to which they relate, or any very transcendent abilities to deal with them properly. Then the hon. Member attacked me for availing myself of the assistance of my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Isle of Thanet, and I much regretted to hear him make several strong personal accusations against my right hon. and gallant Friend, which my right hon. and gallant Friend has already amply and fully refuted. The hon. Gentleman opposite must be aware that when he and his Friends adopted the plan of personal accusation against my right hon. and gallant Friend, my right hon. and gallant Friend—I think with becoming patience—did not condescend to answer them until, in the public interest, he was driven to do so a few days ago. Did the hon. Member opposite hear the observations made by my right hon. and gallant Friend on that occasion? Did he hear him explain that in 1881—I think that was the year—

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet): Yes; that was the year.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Did he hear my right hon. and gallant Friend explain that in 1881, on a rental which I believe is more than £40,000, the whole difference from Griffith's valuation was not more than £100? And is the hon. Gentleman not aware that Griffith's valuation was made at a time when prices were lower than they are now? ["No, no!"] Yes; that is so—that Griffith's valuation was made at a time when prices were lower than they are now? And is he aware that Griffith's valuation was not made for the purpose of rental, but for the purposes of taxation, and, being made for purposes of taxation, was generally estimated to be not less than 25 per cent below the letting value of the land?

MR. CLANCY: (Dublin Co., N.): Rubbish!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hear the hon. Member use an argument familiar with hon. Members who sit below the Gangway opposite—he objects to my statement as "rubbish." I do not know which of my propositions he objects to as rubbish.

MR. CLANCY: All of them.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Does he mean to say that prices were not lower then than they are now? If he will take the trouble to look into the facts he will see that I am right. Does he deny that Griffith's valuation was made for the purposes of taxation, and not for the purpose of rental? Does he deny that, being made for the purposes of taxation, it was estimated at a figure below the letting value of the land? If he does not deny any of these things, and if he admits, as he must admit, that the rental of my right hon. and gallant Friend's estate is as I have said—if we are to condescend to discuss these personal matters—if he sees that my right hon. and gallant Friend's rental was within £100 of Griffith's valuation, or, in other words, that there was only a fractional difference between the two, will he not admit that my right hon. and gallant Friend cannot in any sense be justly accused of being a man who attempts to drive his tenants hard, or to exact from them more than they can be honestly expected to pay? I confess that I regard the attacks which have been made upon myself with perfect indifference. Every Chief Secretary for Ireland has to undergo attacks of that kind, and I am quite aware that if it were my lot—as probably it will not be—in two or three years' time to agree with hon. Members opposite on any matter upon which they have set their hearts, they would probably laud me with the same amount of eulogy which they accord to Lord Spencer and to Sir George Trevelyan, whom they attacked far more unscrupulously and violently than they have so far attacked myself. But I confess I regret the ground of attack that has been made on my right hon. and gallant Friend the Under Secretary. No man in this House knows more about Ireland than he does. No man in this House is more capable of effectively discharging the duties of his Office; and if he is prepared to discharge those duties so far without reward, is that to be made a reproach to him, and ought it not to be regarded as an additional proof of the disinterested services he is ready to give to Ireland? The hon. Member opposite objects to my not being here to answer Questions. [An hon. MEMBER: We object to you altogether.] I do not appeal to him; but I appeal to other Members, in whatever quarter of the House they sit, to say whether my right hon. and gallant Friend has not discharged the duties of his Office, be they difficult or be they easy, to the satisfaction of every reasonable man? Whether he has not shown himself fully adequate to the discharge of every duty that has been intrusted to him? But I may tell the Committee that outside the House my right hon. and gallant Friend's services have been even greater than they have been inside, and my right hon. and gallant Friend has brought to the assistance of the Irish Government—and I am proud to acknowledge it in spite of the sneers of hon. Gentlemen opposite—an ability, an industry and knowledge, from which the Government derived great advantage, and which, at all events, I am glad hon. Members have given me an opportunity of acknowledging in my place.

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): Sir, it seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) has, to-night, surpassed himself. The object of the Government, I suppose, is to obtain this Vote on Account with as little difficulty and as little delay as possible. The right hon. Gentleman has made the speech to which we have just listened, and has made very light of his duties in this House. He has read over some of the Questions—

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: All of them.

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: He has read over the Questions addressed to him by name by the Representatives of Irish constituencies, and he has found them one and all unworthy of the notice of so exalted a personage as the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. The right hon. Gentleman has had Predecessors in that Office who have had quite as much on their hands as he has. I speak of the late Mr. Forster, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for one of the Divisions of Bristol, the right hon.

Gentleman's immediate Predecessor (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach)—I single them out, because they were at the same time Members of the Cabinet while they were Chief Secretaries for Ireland, which makes a material difference between their positions and that occupied by more humble persons, such as myself, who, when they held the Office of Chief Secretary, had not a place in the Cabinet. Mr. Forster and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol never, that I am aware, declined to answer Questions that were addressed to them by Irish Members in this House. The right hon. Gentleman speaks of himself or his Assistant in this House as the conduit-pipe for local information. He admits that he did not, until he rose to-night, look at the Paper to see what was on it, so that we shall know in the future, when the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) rises to answer Questions, he does not speak in the name of the Chief Secretary or in that of the Irish Government, but merely in his own name. I have had myself some experience in answering Questions. I believe I had one day the heaviest list ever presented to any Irish Secretary, because I had to answer no fewer than 51 Questions. I will venture to tell the right hon. Gentleman what my experience was. I gave a great deal more than three minutes' consideration to each of these Questions. The answers which were sent to me from Ireland were in many cases extremely unsatisfactory, and again and again I had to communicate with the officials who had furnished me with those answers. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] From watching that process again and again, grievances and evils were brought to my notice which I, in turn, had to consider and bring before my Chief—the then Viceroy Lord Spencer—and I can say honestly that I believe a great deal of good was done by the multitude of Questions put, although in this House they sometimes seemed excessive. The mere answering of a Question is not the only part of it. The object is to bring to any ordinary mind the fact of a certain grievance existing; but the right hon. Gentleman has proclaimed to the House to-night, as we might, indeed, have expected from his general manner and treatment of the subject, that he moves in a sphere altogether above the consideration of these matters. Then, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the complaints that have been made of the appointment of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet. I need hardly say that, on the personal part of that question, I have nothing to say. So far as answering Questions goes and his career as a Member of this House, I have nothing to say whatever against that right hon. and gallant Gentleman; but when hon. Members complain of his being appointed to take the place of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, not occasionally, but habitually and every day, what occurs to most of us is this—that although that treatment of the subject may be very suitable for Irish Questions, it would not be tolerated for one moment with regard to English Questions. What would be said if, I will say, the Civil Lord of the Admiralty were day after day to answer all the Questions addressed to the First Lord of the Admiralty, and then, when the Questions were all over, the House were to see the First Lord come in with a jauntair and take his seat on the Treasury Bench? Why, Sir, there is no one on the other side of the House who would consider that a tolerable arrangement for one week, although if the First Lord were ill or absent from an unavoidable cause, it would, of course, be the commonest thing in the world that his subordinate should answer the Questions for him. But not only is that the case, but the officer who has to answer the Questions is unpaid, or, in other words, has been appointed to his present position without the knowledge or consent of Parliament. There is a very strict limit set upon the number of officials who can sit in Parliament receiving salary. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) will say that this does not exempt him from the power of adding to the number of officials who do not receive salaries. Well, Sir, that may be the technical excuse, but I do not think there is much real foundation in it. If a Member of this House is appointed to even a subordinate place in the Government, though he receives no salary, he has emolument—surely his emolument does not entirely consist of salary. He has the honour of sitting on the Treasury Bench, which, of itself, is much coveted, and he has all the dignity and importance attached to a Member of Her Majesty's Government, and I see nothing to hinder the Government, on the same footing, appointing 40 or 50 of their followers subordinate Members of the Government, and thus completely getting round all the guarantees that have been laid down by the rules which at present govern these matters. These are the reasons why we find the present arrangement very extraordinary. But it adds to the singularity of the situation when we find that at the same moment that there is this double arrangement in the House of Commons it so happens that there is also a double arrangement in the House of Lords, and that the Government have, for the first time, I believe, not only a Chief Secretary in the Cabinet, but a Lord Chancellor for Ireland in the Cabinet, and that Lord Chancellor, the only reason for whose position in the Cabinet one would take to be that he should represent the Government in the House of Lords, does not represent the Government in the House of Lords, but another Member of the Cabinet is appointed for the duty. The result is that there are three Members of the Cabinet representing Ireland, two in the House of Lords and one in this House, and; in addition to these, we have the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet. These are the reasons why it does appear to us that this is a very extraordinary arrangement; and I cannot say that these reasons have been at all obviated or diminished in our minds by the speech which has just been delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I have been greatly edified by the excitement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The complaint of the right hon. Gentleman is that the affairs of Ireland have been looked after by more Members of the present Government than has been the case under preceding Governments. The complaint that has been made by hon. Members opposite is, that it appears to the present Government that the interests of Ireland are of such great importance that not only the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), but an Assistant Secretary, the Lord Privy Seal, and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland have interested themselves and have concerned themselves deeply in endeavouring—[Laughter.] I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair whether it is fitting that the laughter of hon. Members below the Gangway opposite should meet a statement—a statement which I am making with the endeavour to recall Parliament to the consideration of the real facts of the case? The Government appreciate the gravity of the circumstances, and the condition of Ireland at the present time. We have felt that any intellect, any skill, and any ability which we possess ought to be devoted to the solution of the great problems which the government of Ireland involves. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland is at the present moment engaged in the consideration and preparation of two most important measures relating to Ireland; and he felt it necessary, and the Government felt it necessary, that he should be assisted by my right hon. and gallant Friend on my left, who brings to his help a knowledge of the circumstances and of the condition of Ireland which hon. Members below the Gangway may not accept as being accurate from their point of view, but which is, of course, of great value in the opinion of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary. What is the complaint of the right hon. Gentleman opposite? The right hon. Gentleman appears to think that because neither Mr. Forster nor Sir George Trevelyan had an Assistant Secretary, therefore it is highly improper that the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary should have an Assistant Secretary.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The complaint was that the present Chief Secretary hands over the duty of answering all the Irish Questions to his Assistant Secretary.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Hands over the duty of answering all the Irish Questions to his Assistant Secretary. Does the right hon. Gentleman not know that the Government are responsible for every answer that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman gives? The right hon. Gentleman must be fully aware that the Government are just as much responsible for the answers that are given by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Assistant Secretary as they are for those given by the Chief Secretary himself. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, when Chief Secretary himself, was not in the Cabinet, and yet his Government were bound by his answers.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I, at all events, was Chief Secretary.

MR. W. H. SMITH: But the right hon. Gentleman was not at the time a Member of the Cabinet. He spoke only with the authority of Chief Secretary; but, nevertheless, his answers bound his Government. Well, the Assistant Secretary represents the Chief Secretary, and binds the Chief Secretary.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The very thing we complain of.

MR. W. H. SMITH: We are asked whether we are going to appoint 40 or 50 Members of this Party to be Assistant Secretaries. Does the right hon. Gentleman really mean to ask such a question as that in good faith? No, Sir; he takes advantage, or he thinks he takes advantage—he does not really take advantage, because it is a remark which really recoils on himself—of circumstances and conditions that are absolutely abnormal. We have endeavoured to do our best to provide for the good government of the country, and have made what arrangements we believed to be necessary. We have come to the conclusion that some assistance must be given to the Chief Secretary, in order to enable him to give due consideration to the preparation and the submission to Parliament of measures which we deem to be of the utmost importance to the peace, the prosperity, and the happiness of Ireland. Of those measures there are two now before Parliament, and a third is in preparation; and the right hon. Gentleman opposite, never having had to produce such measures, has no idea of the amount of labour and of responsibility that the preparation of those measures involves. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said that Parliament had no notice of the appointment of my right hon. and gallant Friend to the Office of Assistant Secretary; but the fact is that Parliament had ample knowledge of it.

MR. M. J. KENNY? Ample notice of the fact?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Ample notice that such an appointment was made; and Parliament knew that it was entirely within the competence of Her Majesty's present Government, or of any other Government who felt it to be their duty, to make such an appointment. I must point to a fact that the right hon. Gentleman opposite is well aware of—namely, that even if the Office to which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman has been appointed had been a paid one, it would not have been necessary that the right hon. Gentleman should have vacated his seat, the post not being one that renders it necessary for the holder to go to his constituents for re-election on his accepting it. With regard to answering Questions, as I have indicated, my right hon. and gallant Friend, in replying to Questions, speaks with the full authority of the Government in giving complete replies to every Question which may fairly be put to the Members of the Government. I fully recognize the responsibility of the Government in answering Questions by whomsoever they may be asked; but, while making proper provision for the answering of Questions, the Government have to discharge the higher duty of seeing that their measures are properly considered and presented to Parliament.

Mr. W. H. Smith

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I can assure the right hon. Gentleman opposite that no one for a moment impugns the motives of the Government in making this appointment. The question for the Committee is whether the Government have acted Constitutionally and in accordance with the law of Parliament in making it. When the right hon. Gentleman pleads in justification of the appointment the abnormal state of affairs existing at the present time, and that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant has on his shoulders two important Bills—that is to say, the Coercion, and, I suppose, the other is the Land Bill now before the House of Lords—I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that Mr. Forster, when Chief Secretary, had on his shoulders not only the preparation and passing through Parliament of a Coercion Bill, but also of a great Land Bill; and that the work devolving on the Chief Secretary in those days was certainly as heavy as that devolving upon the present Chief Secretary to-day. I should be sorry if this question assumed anything of a personal character. I certainly do not consider the Chief Secretary over-paid, because I consider that there is only one post in Europe which, for the anxiety and responsibility it entails, could compare with that of the right hon. Gentleman, and that is the position of the Czar of Russia. The right hon. Gentleman may very well say that no compensation can be too high for the responsibility, the anxiety, and the vexation of his Office, whoever fills it, whether a Member of the Party sitting opposite, or sitting on this side of the House. But what I wish to ask the Committee is—and this appears to be a favourable opportunity for doing it, an opportunity for which one has hitherto sought in vain—whether the appointment of the Under Secretary for Ireland is a Constitutional one or not?

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think it would be appropriate to raise that question.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER: I bow, of course, to your ruling, Sir; but as the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has attempted to justify the appointment I wished to enter a protest upon the point. I will not pursue the matter one sentence further. I should have been glad of an opportunity of saying that I consider that the creation of any new Office under the Crown, whether or not its acceptance involved the vacating of a seat in this House—for I do not lay stress on that point—without the consent of Parliament is un-Constitutional. As, however, you rule, Sir, that it is not competent for me to go into the question at this moment, I will say no more with regard to it, but will take another opportunity of calling attention to it.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): The speeches we have listened to from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, more than any other speeches which we have heard from the Tory Party for some time, show the appropriateness of the name applied to them of "the stupid Party." Both right hon. Gentlemen, in the course of their speeches, occupied a considerable time in sounding the praises of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Assistant Under Secretary—or Under Secretary—whatever he may be called. One would think, from the speech of the Chief Secretary, that the duties of the right hon.

and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) has to discharge in this House are duties of the utmost importance, and that he discharges them with an amount of ability which must command the confidence and admiration of this Assembly. Now, what are the duties, so far as we can see, which have been discharged by that right hon. and gallant Gentleman? Why, the merest schoolboy of a few years' experience would be able to do that which the two Leaders of the Tory Party in this House so loudly praise the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet for doing. His duties, so far as we can see, consist in his standing there at the Table and reading out to us answers prepared for him by some police constable or other official in Ireland. That is the only exercise of his extraordinary powers that we have seen in this House; and, certainly, I do not think the Government are to be complimented on the fact of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's addition to their ranks. They comfort themselves with the idea that they have got, in the right hon. and gallant Member for the Isle of Thanet, a real acquisition; but, as I have said, he is no more valuable to them than would be a schoolboy of a year's experience. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in the manner in which he treated the Questions put by the Irish Members in this House to-night, has furnished another proof that the suspicion which was in the minds of hon. Members on this side of the House, and which was given expression to by the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), is amply justified—namely, that he is determined to treat with contempt the elected Representatives of the people of Ireland, and therefore he has refrained from being in his place when Questions affecting Ireland have been before the House. We do not complain of having to deal with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet, as compared with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. What we complain of is that the official who replies to us is not responsible to this House or to Parliament. We contend that he should not be a mere instrument of the Government, but should be able to give effect to the answers he gives us. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, standing up at the Table, in the course of his speech to-night, has shown us that so long as these Questions have been answered by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet they have been answered altogether on his own responsibility, and the responsibility of the officials in Ireland, and that the officials in this House, to whom we are to look for redress of grievances and abuses in Irish Governmental Departments, is altogether ignorant of the representations we make. The right hon. Gentleman treats with supreme contempt—with a contempt that is, if possible, more offensive than his whole bearing upon Irish matters—the Questions that are asked by Irish Members. The right hon. Gentleman pretends to have some knowledge of Ireland. We complain that while before we could very well afford to stand his ignorance of Ireland and Irish affairs, because it did not affect us, that now he is the one officer who is responsible for Irish affairs he keeps out of the House when Questions are being asked, and he never can have any knowledge of the facts to which these Questions relate. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that he made a great point when he said that if, in a few years hence, he should become a convert to our opinions upon the Home Rule Question, we should be likely to praise him just as we praised former Chief Secretaries for Ireland. I can re-assure the right hon. Gentleman on that point. We always know how to make a distinction between men who understand their duties and stick to them, however disagreeable they may be, and men who run away from them. We have often opposed Irish Secretaries, but even when we differed most from them we have seldom had to deny them the possession of courage and the possession of a sense of duty. But even if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary should become a convert to our opinions, unless he changes his policy he will never be able to get the credit of having stuck to his post. He has found it very convenient to get as a substitute a political Cerberus in the person of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet. I must say we had very little confidence in the knowledge which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary brings to bear on Irish subjects; but if there is one man in Ireland whom no Chief Secretary could afford to stand up and justify before the Irish people, that man is the right hon. Gentleman's Colleague the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet, one of the rack-renting landlords of Ireland. It is an insult to the Irish representation and to the Irish people that the Chief Secretary should shelter himself behind such a personage in this House, and excuse himself from giving to the work of the Department to which he belongs and to the Irish people the benefit of qualities for the possession of which, presumably, he was appointed. The right hon. Gentleman has given us some figures as to the rental of the estate of his right hon. and gallant Colleague. I do not wish to dwell on that subject—I should be out of Order if I did; but I do not think we should not allow the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman to pass unchallenged. He stated, on information, no doubt, received from his right hon. and gallant Colleague, that in 1881 there was only £100 difference between the entire rental of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's property and the gross Government valuation. Well, but all the property in the hands of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, and all that which he farms himself, is taken from the rental, but is left in in the valuation which is given. That makes a very important difference. I notice that the right hon. Gentleman does not stand up to challenge that statement. Is the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary aware that, by the information which is supplied to him, and which he gives to the House, English Members are deceived in these matters? On the strength of assurances and untruths supplied to him, he stands up and deceives the House. Then there is another important matter. Numbers of holdings on this property were let before it came into the possession of the right hon. and gallant Member for the Isle of Thanet, and were let on fines that were extorted from the tenants.

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet): I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the hon. and learned Member is in Order in imputing untruths to a Member of this House? I wish to explain that no fines have been taken on my property for three generations.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. and learned Member does impute untruth to any other Member he is distinctly out of Order.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON was understood to disclaim having imputed untruth to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: The hon. and learned Gentleman distinctly used the word "untruth."

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: I distinctly stated that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman gave to the Chief Secretary this statement—that there was only a difference of £100 between the rental of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman and the valuation of his property; but that he omitted to state that the amount of the property in his own hands was included in the valuation, while no rental was allowed for; and that in this way the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was put in a position to state an untruth to the House.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I am in the recollection of the Committee. The hon. and learned Gentleman distinctly said that I had stated an untruth.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Gentleman disavows any such statement.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: I never said anything of the kind. If I had made the statement I have now made to the House in the absence of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet, I have no doubt that hon. Members on the other side would have got up and denied what I have stated. But now I congratulate the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that he has, by his challenge, emphasized the important difference I have pointed out, and also the manner in which the House has been deceived. Then there is another point. While part of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's estate is held at low rents by large graziers, who have extensive tracts of the estate, he has raised the rents of the smaller tenants on the other portions of his estate as often and as much as he could raise them. That is the state of facts of which he has been proved guilty by the Sub-Commissioners. I will read to the House some of the rentals on the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's estate, with the reductions that have been made.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member himself, at the beginning of his remarks, seemed to feel that he was going beyond the Question in entering into details, and yet he now proposes to go into matters only very remotely connected with the Vote before the Committee. It would be quite out of Order to enter into the details he proposes to state.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: I will only give the sum total of the rentals, and the valuation on a single page of the decisions of the Sub-Commissioners. Now, upon one page of these decisions I find the Poor Law valuation is £584. The gross rental was £658, and that rent was reduced from £658 to £392. That is the model landlord who is held up to our admiration by the Chief Secretary; and when we are told by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that the reason for the absence of the Chief Secretary from the House is that he is hatching important measures relating to the holding of land in Ireland, we have an idea of the spirit in which he will approach the question from the character as a landlord which he has given to his Colleague. Now, my reason for objecting to the manner in which we have been treated in regard to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) is this—that I look on his appointment as a reward for political recreancy alone. We have heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary an assurance that, at all events, there was no danger that he would come over to our opinions on the Home Rule Question. Will he give us the same assurance with equal confidence in regard to his Colleague? He is an older Home Ruler than I am. He was a Home Ruler long before I could say a word on the subject. Lately I possessed myself of the minutes of the Home Rule League—the minutes of their various meetings with the strong resolutions they passed.

THE CHAIRMAN: One portion of this Vote is for the salary of the Chief Secretary. He has devolved a certain part of his duties on the Under Secretary, and that is properly a subject of criticism. But as the right hon. and gallant Member for the Isle of Thanet is not provided for out of the Vote his character and conduct are not the subject for criticism.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): On what Vote or in what manner are we to discuss the way in which the right hon. and gallant Member for the Isle of Thanet discharges his duties?

THE CHAIRMAN: The discharge of his duties in this House does become matter for criticism; but his character and past career as a Home Ruler do not become matter for criticism.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: Now, I shall not dwell further on this subject, which I know cannot be a very pleasant one to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet or for the Government. I hope we shall have some opportunity for voting a salary to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, in order that on the Vote for his salary we may show his Colleagues what manner of man he was. I will now only finish by saying that I believe the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has treated the House in regard to important Irish Questions is the most instructive lesson which has been given to the people of Ireland, and also to the people of England, for a considerable time. As the hon. Member who has preceded me in this debate has remarked, no Member of the Government would attempt to treat any other portion of Her Majesty's Dominions with the same contempt with which Ireland has been treated by the right hon. Gentleman. He cannot deny that he has constantly remained away from the House while Irish Questions are treated at Question time, and that he has delegated the performance of his duty in regard to answering Questions to a Colleague who is altogether irresponsible to us and to this House. I think that if the right hon. Gentleman persists in the course he has lately taken, and if he persists in showing the same contempt which he has recently displayed for Irish Questions, it will be the duty of the Irish Members to take every opportunity to drag before the people of this country the manner in which Ireland is being treated at a time when you insist on the people of Ireland keeping themselves associated with the Union.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN (Kent, Isle of Thanet): I am only going to touch very lightly on one or two points to which the hon. and learned Member who has just sat down (Mr. T. C. Harrington) alluded, because he somewhat challenged me to do so; while, at the same time, he charged me with not being frank in the statement I made to the House the other day. There is one point in that statement in regard to which the hon. and learned Member seems to think that he has hit a blot, and which certainly needs explanation. That is that, in my statement as to the relative income and valuation of my estate, I did not include in the income my demesne and other land actually in hand. I thought that a matter of no importance in dealing with a large property of over 75,000 acres. The matter was so exceedingly small that I did not include the land referred to. Then, the hon. and learned Gentleman said that the rents as they existed in 1881 were rents fixed by my ancestors. Well, they were, and they were never raised by me. Therefore, I think it is for the credit both of my ancestors and myself that, as he has himself stated, those rents were below Griffith's valuation. Then the hon. and learned Member took up the Blue Book, and read one page to show the reduction of rent on one part of my property in the county of Longford; and he implied that I had raised my rents in the county of Longford. Upon my honour I never raised any rents in the county of Longford; and upon my honour I spent £24,000 in 1879, 1880, and 1881—the years of the famine—on my property in the county of Longford on which these tenants resided, and for that outlay of £24,000 I never received, and I never charged, one penny of interest.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid.): The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet has just stated that from 1879 to 1881 he spent £24,000 on his estates in the county of Longford, which he borrowed from the Government at a nominal rate of interest—[MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: He never expended it.]—and which there was reason to believe was not as fully expended as it had been liberally lent.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must withdraw, and apologize for that statement and accusation.

MR. M. J. KENNY: I only repeated an accusation which has been made; but as you, Sir, have ruled that the observation I made was out of Order, I withdraw it accordingly and apologize for it. I will only say that I regret that I had not an opportunity to state in this House what I believe to be the facts of the case with regard to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. This is the first case in the history of the Irish Secretaryship in which we are placed in the position of having a nominal Chief Secretary who receives a considerable salary and does nothing in this House except jibe and flout, in pinchbeck imitation of one of his family, at the Questions of the Irish Members; and in the most supercilious manner possible meets our statements and charges with an affectation of absolute contempt. We are fully determined that we shall press for an explanation as to the appointment of this Under Secretary who has been put into the position he now occupies, and who resembles what is called in Ireland a species of "potheen boy"—one who does the dirty work of the Chief Secretary. I have heard that the Chinese used to be in the habit of flinging malodorous grenades at the enemy to prevent them advancing, and I believe the appointment of the present Parliamentary Under Secretary has been made in the same spirit, and with the same intention of flinging something malodorous before the Irish Members so that they cannot attack the Government of the day. I think, however, before the Government have got to the end of their tether, they will find that they have not gained much by appointing an ornamental Chief Secretary and an Orange Under Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said, a few minutes ago, that we should be likely to speak in the same manner of him, if he changed his opinions, that we do of Lord Spencer, now that he has changed his opinions. I cannot, however, conceive the possibility of comparison between the two men. I can conceive no manner of mental or moral measurement which would bring the two men together. I do not know how it is possible to compare or measure against each other a giant like Lord Spencer and a pigmy like the present Chief Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary commenced his reply to the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) by reading some Questions, and asking whether he could be expected to answer such Questions:

Well, two of those Questions were put down by Orange Members who support his policy, and I question whether the Orange Democrats who sent those Members to this House would appreciate the supercilious tone adopted by the Chief Secretary towards their Parliamentary Representatives in this House. I do not know whether we shall have any regular opportunity of raising the question of the appointment of the present Under Secretary. I have heard it stated that the present Under Secretary, though nominally unpaid, is a fairly well-remunerated official. I have heard it stated that the present Chief Secretary is content to accept a portion of his nominal salary, and that the remainder is distributed as a gratuity to those who discharge some of his Parliamentary functions.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The statement or conjecture just made is entirely, absolutely, and totally unfounded.

An hon. MEMBER: More shame for it.

MR. M. J. KENNY: If the right hon. Gentleman had done as I have suggested, it would have been no more than reasonable and just. I would remind the Committee that we have in this House, besides the Chief Secretary and this notable Under Secretary, two Law Officers of the Crown—one who takes some part in discussing a portion of the clauses of the Bill now before the House, while the other has done nothing for his official position. Formerly, when the Chief Secretary was absent from this House, the Law Officers have answered Questions. What I want to know is this—why two Irish lawyers, who have as much knowledge of the Irish people as the Under Secretary for Ireland, and have not, like him, been brought into conflict with the Irish people on questions relating to the land, who are, at least, as intelligent as the Parliamentary Under Secretary, and have had the benefit of a legal training, which he has not had—I say I want to know why these Gentlemen, who are responsible to this House and the country, because they are paid for the discharge of their duties, have not been put into requisition, and called upon to discharge the duties which in former times have been discharged by the Law Officers? The appointment of a Parliamentary Under Secretary now is extraordinary. In former times the Parliamentary Under Secretaryship was a political appointment, and was only held while the Government by whom the holder was appointed retained Office. I believe in the time of Thomas Drummond the appointment was altogether political. That system is, it appears, to be again introduced. But it must not be forgotten that we have now a so-called Permanent Under Secretary in Dublin, as well as a Political Under Secretary in this House. When that Permanent Under Secretary goes back to the War Office, will the two Offices be amalgamated? That is what we want to know. But, in the meantime, we must protest against the appointment of an Orangeman without salary, and, therefore, irresponsible to this House. I will only say, further, that the appointment seems to have been made on the old principle of setting one Irishman against another, so that Englishmen may then go about the country saying—"See how these Irishmen agree in the House of Commons; what will they do at home?"

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I rise to move the reduction of this Vote by £1,000, as a protest against the manner in which the Chief Secretary for Ireland declines—and says that he will decline—to discharge his duty. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is utterly wrong in supposing that I quarrel with the amount of his salary. I did indeed, in the early part of the evening, say something about the amount proposed to be voted to him for coals; but with his salary I have no quarrel, provided his duties are satisfactorily discharged. What I quarrel with is the way in which he is discharging the duties of his Office; and, therefore, to enable the Committee to protest against this, I propose, as I have said, to move that this Vote be reduced by £1,000. I do not find fault with the fact that the Chief Secretary has called in help to assist him in discharging the very onerous duties of his position. I do not quarrel with any Irish Secretary for calling in the help of one or two officials in this House. On the contrary, I think the Irish Chief Secretary would do very well if he got a suitable Assistant in this House, and then went himself to Dublin for the next three months. And if he had a man in this House who would decently answer Questions under his directions, I would not complain if he remained at Dublin. But what I quarrel with is the character of the help that the Chief Secretary has called in. I do not, Sir, propose to quarrel with your ruling as to the limits of this discussion; but I may be permitted to point out that your ruling has only emphasized the scandalous inconvenience of the course pursued by the Government. They have sought to create a new Office at a most critical time, and they have appointed to this Office a Gentleman whose antecedents utterly disqualify him for the Office he has been appointed to fill. And they have done this in such a manner that it is difficult to see how we can raise the question of the fitness of this Gentleman to discharge the duties of his Office, though it is impossible to contend that we should not be able to raise that question in some shape or way. I do not, Sir, wish to come into collision with your ruling; but I may be allowed to point out a few particulars in which, I think, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman is singularly and peculiarly unfitted to fill the Office in which he is now placed. I wish to direct the attention of the House, in the first place, to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), because I think they were very unfortunate. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Government were actuated in this appointment by a desire to assist the present Chief Secretary for Ireland in the preparation and conduct of two or three important measures which are now before Parliament, and which they deem essential to the preservation of peace and order in Ireland. Now, I consider that to be a most ominous declaration on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. We supposed before this that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was a kind of assistant to the Chief Secretary for an hour in the evening; but now we are told that he is a Member of the Irish Cabinet, and is appointed to give advice as to measures of importance in connection with Ireland.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; the First Lord of the Treasury did not say that. The Parliamentary Under Secre-

MR. DILLON: Of course I spoke metaphorically. When I used the expression, "Irish Cabinet," I meant the Body that controls and directs Irish Business. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury distinctly stated that the chief object of calling the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel King-Harman) to the position he now occupies was, that he should assist the Government with his knowledge of Ireland and with his advice in modelling great measures to be laid before Parliament. In my ears that was a most ominous declaration, because it amounted to this, that not only were we, in the future, to look to the influence of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Thanet Division of Kent in the administration of the law in Ireland, but even in the shaping of Irish legislation in this House he was to be behind the scenes. Having that in my mind, there are certain things that have occurred in Ireland quite recently, which, in view of these facts, are exceedingly interesting. Within the last fortnight a practice has been revived in Ireland which has been renounced for three years, the practice of calling what are known as Rival Loyalist demonstrations in Ulster for the purpose of suppressing liberty of speech; and it is a most singular and ominous thing that the revival of that practice should have synchronized with the appointment of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who has now a potential voice in Irish affairs—our memory has been refreshed in regard to this subject by a speech which Sir George Trevelyan has delivered this evening in London. Sir George Trevelyan reminded his hearers of the time when the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Thanet Division of Kent denounced him and Lord Spencer for giving protection to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), when he attempted to address meetings in the North of Ireland; and Sir George Trevelyan went on to say that the Coercion Bill was framed for the suppression of the National League. The House will see how that bears on the condition of Ireland at the present moment. When a meeting is summoned to protest against the Coercion Bill, the Orangemen call a counter demonstration; the Executive denounces both meetings, and the people of Ulster are not allowed to express their opinion at all upon the Bill. A man whose past career entitles us to suspect that he is at this hour in collusion with these very Orange Societies in Ulster is now a great power in the control of the Executive; and, for aught we know, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland may be telling the masters of the Orange Lodges in Ulster to summon these counter meetings for the purpose of preventing a legitimate expression of opinion in regard to the policy of the Government. Is this a state of things that ought to be tolerated? This is the reason why the political actions of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Thanet Division of Kent are brought under discussion. We are desirous of showing that we are justified in the suspicions and fears which we entertain as to what his conduct will be in the future. I think I have established some case for holding the right hon. and gallant Gentleman more or less responsible for these proceedings in the Province of Ulster. I put it to the House—to hon. Members of all shades of political opinion—Can there be a more unkind or cruel mode of proceeding than to proclaim legitimate meetings, and thus suppress the right of freedom of speech at a most critical time, simply because the Orangemen put out placards announcing rival demonstrations. This is the very thing which Lord Spencer moved armies into Ulster to prevent.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN (Isle of Thanet): I may say at once that there is not the slightest word of foundation for the suggestion.

MR. DILLON: There is not the slightest word of foundation for what suggestion?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: For the suggestion that I have encouraged the Orangemen to call counter demonstrations.

MR. DILLON: Does the right hon. and gallant Gentleman say that there is not the slightest word of foundation for the suggestion that the policy of Lord Spencer in this respect has been departed from, and that there is an end of liberty of speech in Ulster; and does he mean to say that that has not taken place since he came into Office, and that now the Orangemen are entitled to boast, as they did not dare to boast when Lord Spencer was in Ireland, that a Nationalist meeting cannot be held in Ulster? Does he deny that he denounced Lord Spencer for the action he took in protecting Nationalist meetings in Ulster?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Yes, I do.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is now travelling beyond the lines of the subject before the Committee.

MR. DILLON: Well, Mr. Courtney, I submit to your ruling; but I think the Government will show very scant consideration to the feelings of the people of Ireland if they refuse to give us some opportunity of discussing fully and fairly this appointment. It is at least unusual to make an appointment of this kind, surrounded as it is with circumstances of suspicion, at such a time; and to do it in such a way that by the technical ruling of the Chair we are robbed of our right of discussing it fully and fairly is, to say the least of it, striking below the belt. Of course, I will not pursue that branch of the subject further. I think I am entitled, however, before I sit down to answer three questions that were put directly to me or to the hon. Members who sit on these Benches by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I shall confine myself as closely as I can to the direct answers to the questions put and challenges given. I shall not enter into the details connected with those questions. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary asked me if I denied that Griffith's valuation of the property of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet was made when prices were much lower. I do deny it. He asked me if I denied that Griffith's valuation being made for purposes of taxation was made below the actual value? I do deny it. And, further, he asked me whether, in view of the statement of fact made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet, that Gentleman could be described as a landlord who acted harshly and unjustly to his tenants? I say yes; and I say that the proofs and records of the Commission show that in many parts of Ireland the rent as fixed by Griffith's valuation is at the present time double what it would be if a fair rent were fixed. I say, moreover, that a man who continues to charge double rents as long as he is allowed is unfitted to be made responsible for the government of Ireland; and while I do not contend that the Chief Secretary can be justly described as the worst landlord in Ireland, I do distinctly believe that he has acted harshly and unjustly to his tenants, and that he would to-day but for the intervention of the Courts of Law, be charging many of them double the value of their land.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £3,829,300, be granted for the said Services."—(Mr. Dillon.)

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I do not rise to continue this discussion in any controversial spirit, but merely to reassure hon. Members upon one or two points. It seems to appear to them that my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Isle of Thanet occupies a different position from other Under Secretaries, that he has a greater share in the administration of the Irish Department than they have in the administration of their respective Departments. I can assure the hon. Member that that view of the position of my right hon. and gallant Friend is not correct. The other question was with regard to the meetings in Ulster. That is a question which deserves the attention of the Government, and I can promise that it shall have my careful consideration.

Mr. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): A discussion of this kind places us in a very inconvenient position. The Government have the great advantage of being able to tell the whole of their case; but when we attempt to answer the questions which they have raised, we are, unfortunately, by the Rules of Debate, more or less out of Order. I always listen with pleasure to any remark that may fall from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He usually leaves a record behind him, and gives us material for further observations. He has done so in the present instance. He has told us that we complain of his salary. I am perfectly unaware of any observations of ours to that effect. He says that his duties are onerous and difficult. We admit that. But we must also say that, while we do not think his salary too large for any Gentleman who adequately discharges the duties imposed upon him, we think it is too large when those duties are inefficiently performed. In the course of his observations, the right hon. Gentleman referred to our complaint that he is so often absent from his place in the House, and said that, inasmuch as we, at the same time, complained of his continued absence from Dublin, we were taking up an inconsistent position. Well, what are the facts? He is not in Ireland, and he is not in the House, except when he comes down to flout and gibe at these Benches on the Coercion Bill, or to assist the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury in the pleasant occupation of shutting our mouths with the closure. We would not object to him being in Ireland; but at present he seems to be in some place of which we know nothing. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said that, so far, the Under Secretary has received no reward. That implies that he will eventually receive some reward. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] I only hope that whatever that remuneration is it will be given rapidly, in order that we may have an opportunity of raising fairly and squarely the whole subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary made one observation which was very alarming in its character. He said that the Questions on the Paper for this evening had reference solely to small local matters. But he omitted all reference to one of those Questions until twice, in a rather marked manner, I drew attention to it. It was Question No. 11, in which an hon. Member asked him whether certain landlords within the Monaghan Union had notified to the Guardians their intention of evicting 65 families forthwith? I only draw attention to this because we were informed by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that the replies of the Under Secretary were given on behalf of the Government, and immediately afterwards the Chief Secretary told us that his right hon. and gallant Friend was not a responsible Member of the Irish Administration. The Chief Secretary must recollect that we have no representative whatever in Ireland, and that we have no means whatever of getting at the ears of any person there who knows about these matters. A very long experience on these Benches has shown hon. Members that applying to Permanent Officials is absolutely fruitless. We have been told that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet has discharged his duties in a satisfactory manner. I presume the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was not in the House some days ago when the Question of the evictions on Lord Granard's estate was asked. I should like to know if the manner in which that Question was answered is considered by the Chief Secretary to be consistent with a satisfactory discharge of duty? The Committee will recollect that upon that occasion the right hon. and gallant Member stated that the Ecclesiastical Authorities were responsible for those evictions; and he went on to answer a further Question in a manner which made a distinct impression upon the mind of the House that those Ecclesiastical Authorities were so responsible. I denied that statement, and I was supported in my denial by the noble Lord himself. I shall be surprised to hear that a statement of that kind meets with the admiration of the Chief Secretary. What I want to point out is this—we have had some considerable experience of Government officials, and in this House we have seen Members of the Government defend in unmeasured language Permanent Officials who afterwards turned out to be criminals of a disgusting character. We warn the right hon. Gentleman that if he makes himself the champion of all the officials of Dublin Castle they will drag him down with them. If he believes everything they say they will go from excess to excess; but if he would make some effort to get information for himself, and not depend entirely upon the officials, good results might be hoped for.

Dr. KENNY (Cork, S.): The remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) were amply justified, if only by the one item extracted from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. I refer to the underhand suppression of Nationalist meetings in Ulster, a practice which has been revived in so suspicious a manner by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet

(Colonel King-Harman). The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said that the subject was under the consideration of the Government, and I hope that when the next Orange meeting is called for the purpose of enabling some local magistrate to go and swear an information that two meetings near each other are to be held and are likely to lead to a breach of the peace, the second meeting will be suppressed, and those who attempted to hold the first meeting will not be interfered with. Irish Members are compelled to put Questions on matters of trifling importance to the Chief Secretary, because there is no permanent official in Ireland amenable to public opinion. In England such officials know that any malfeasance in office will be visited severely by public opinion, and this knowledge is a powerful factor in restraining them from committing any excesses. That is not the case in Ireland. There an official does not look upon himself as a servant of the public, but as the master of the public. That is one reason why we put Questions in this House, on what appear to the philosophical mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to be small and trivial subjects. No doubt it may be annoying to him to have to come down to this House and answer Questions on such matters; but he is paid for it, and I think he ought not to employ a journeyman to do the work for him. Certainly, if he does employ a journeyman he ought to employ one who knows his trade. The appointment of the Under Secretary is an admirable example of the manner in which the Government of Ireland is conducted. If the Government had not been infected with the usual ineptitude which followed the footsteps of those who attempt to govern Ireland against her will, they would have seen that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet was the last man in the world who should have been chosen for a post of this kind. There is not a man who is looked upon with greater suspicion than one with such a record. I remember the career of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, and I remember taking a very humble part in some of the contests in which he has been engaged. I think that one of the first subscriptions I ever gave was to a fund for his election expenses when he was a Home Rule candidate. I would just refer to the fact that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman has repudiated with great heat, and possibly with a great deal of justification, the imputation of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Tyrone (Mr. M. J. Kenny) about the money he received for his estates. I would point out that my hon. Friend only repeated an assertion which has been publicly made in Ireland, and which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman did not contradict.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is well aware that I stopped the hon. Member for Mid Tyrone from entering into that subject.

DR. KENNY: Then, Sir, I will not enter into that. I must, however, protest against the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. A. J. Balfour) has treated the Irish Members. The right hon. Gentleman has treated us with the most supercilious indifference. He is not entitled to adopt towards us the attitude and the manner which he is very much in the habit of adopting here. If he did not do so he would not require so often to seek protection under the wing of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), who is always ready to come forward in his best Mrs. Gamp manner on behalf of his Friends in this House. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would, also, have much more time to give to those studies in which he appears to be so much wrapped up, if he would take more trouble to inform himself on the points to which inquiries are directed in this House, and would take some steps to curb the pride of officials in Ireland.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I rise for the purpose of appealing to the Committee that this long and painful discussion should be brought to a close. I would make a special appeal to hon. Members below the Gangway on this—the Opposition—side of the House. I have had a long acquaintance—I may say friendship—with the right hon. Gentleman the Parliamentary Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Colonel King-Harman), and I am sorry that he has been placed in the position of having his conduct called in question. I looked upon his appointment from the first moment I heard of it as the appointment of an honourable man. I am utterly unable to sympathize with the proposal for the reduction of the salary of the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour). For many years I have held the opinion that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant has far more duties placed upon his shoulders than any mortal man can discharge as long as Ireland is governed through Dublin Castle in the manner in which it has been governed since I came into Parliament. The Chief Secretary for Ireland is practically the head of all the Irish Departments in this House, and up to a short time ago he was practically without assistance. He has had to look after all the Departments which in England and Scotland are divided among half a dozen officers; and I have always thought that the step which has lately been taken of appointing an Under Secretary ought to have been taken long ago. The proposal to-night is to reduce the salary of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, because he has an unpaid assistant. I am not going to say that in my humble opinion the appointment of the present Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, or of the assistant Chief Secretary, was the very best appointments that Her Majesty's Administration could have made; but, I think, if we are dissatisfied we ought rather to attack the men than the money. If the Chief Secretary is the wrong man, we ought to have a Resolution directed, not against the salary, but against the right hon. Gentleman himself. The salary is not too large. My belief is that the total amount ought to be increased for the purpose of paying an assistant. Holding these views, although I do think that now and then the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary does answer Questions and join in debate in a manner which somewhat irritates Gentlemen on this side of the House, both above and below the Gangway, I cannot vote to-night for the diminution of the salary which I think he is trying to earn to the best of his ability by the tenure of an Office which I certainly do not envy him for a moment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I am sorry to continue the discussion at this hour of the night, but I wish to make only one or two observations. In the first place, I wish to point out to my hon. Friend who has just spoken that our contention is not that the salary of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant is too large for the work he has to do, but that—and I do not wish to be guilty of any discourtesy in saying this—he has not performed the duties of his Office, having in this differed from all his Predecessors. I must say that I think the Ministers of all Departments in this country, and especially those having seats in the House of Commons, are entirely too hard worked. That is one of the matters that will have to be reformed by-and-bye in the administration of this country. At the same time, I think that Ministers generally set a good example to the rest of the country by the manner in which they stick to their work by night and by day, and sacrifice their convenience, and frequently their health, in the performance of their official duties. Our complaint against the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland is, that he does not follow their good example. I would point out that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury attends to his duties with great assiduity, and that he is not as young a man as the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I say it in no invidious sense. But the Chief Secretary for Ireland is the only single Member on that Bench in a Ministerial position who is not here at Question time to answer Questions, and who does not take the interest in his Office, and devote that labour to it which would accord with the best traditions of this country. That is what my objection to this Vote is based upon. I dare say that the question of salary will by-and-bye come to be one of interest to Gentlemen on these Benches. We shall then be quite ready to pay more money, because, at least, five persons will carry out the duties now assigned to the Chief Secretary for Ireland. As to the question of the proclaimed meetings in Ulster, whilst I acknowledge to the full the courtesy and readiness with which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland undertook to look into that question, I must express my disappointment that he is only going to look into it now.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I said I was looking into it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Well, I am very glad to hear it. I would just point out that more than one of these meetings has been prohibited. That is a step which ought not to be taken, except on the advice of the highest Executive Officer, and it throws a great light on the way affairs are managed in Ireland when we hear that such a step could be taken without the knowledge and consent of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. However, the right hon. Gentleman has promised to look into the matter. As to the appointment of the Parliamentary Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman), the Committee must see the inconvenient position in which we are placed. I regret that it has been felt necessary to make anything in the nature of a personal attack upon the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. I am sure that this is not done with any willingness. But when a man is appointed to any Office he must be prepared to have his life and actions subjected to the strictest scrutiny. I understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant to say that he thought an opportunity ought to be given for a discussion respecting the creation of the Office of Under Secretary for Ireland. I should like to know what opportunity will be given. I am sure that if the right hon. Gentleman can give us some assurance on that point he would put an end to this debate for the evening. I think the right hon. Gentleman will himself recognize that we are placed in an entirely unconstitutional position when we have a man appointed to high Office, and, because no salary is attached to that Office, are deprived of all opportunity of criticizing the appointment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The intention has always been to bring in a Bill which will give the hon. Member the opportunity he asks for. [Cries of "When?"] This Session.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I must say it is a matter for regret that this discussion was not allowed, under the circumstances, to be taken earlier in the evening, because it is a subject upon which, I believe, every member of the Party to which I have the honour to belong might legitimately contribute a speech. If there had been no other reason for taking part in a discussion on the Chief Secretary's salary, I consider that ample reason was given by the speech which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) made in reply to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon). I look upon the conduct generally of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland as being absolutely insulting to the Irish Members. It seems to me to be nothing less than an insult, when a Representative of Ireland, according to his rights, puts a Question to the Chief Secretary for Ireland in this House for the right hon. Gentleman not to condescend to reply, but to pitch the Question down the Treasury Bench to the Under Secretary. That is a course of conduct which has never been adopted in this House before, and it is a course of conduct which will not make matters more easy in Ireland for the right hon. Gentleman or his Government, because it cannot be taken otherwise than as insulting to the Irish Representatives. The right hon. Gentleman sneers at the Questions we put on the Paper. He seems not to be aware that in so sneering he is bringing forward one of the best arguments for Home Rule. The right hon. Gentleman a short time ago read out some of the Questions which appeared on the Paper to-day, and sneered in a lofty manner at their insignificance. What we contend is that you, by your system of Government, compel us to bring such matters before this House. As long as we have no Court of Appeal, but this House, it is an absolute and wanton insult for the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to sneer at our questions, and to say that they are insignificant. He knows that they are of the highest and first importance to the people of our constituencies who delegate us to ask them. I do not wish to pursue this matter further, except to say that if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland and his Government wished to get any assistance in connection with Irish matters, they might at least, if they were wise, without going into the character of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Colonel King-Harman) at all, have appointed a Gentleman who, at least, would receive the support and confidence of the Irish people. I challenge the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, if he wishes to test the feeling of the Irish people, to call a meeting in any part of Ireland, and ask whether it will give him its confidence. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman is an outcast from the National Party, and is not a very popular member of the Party to which he now belongs, so that he is looked upon with a certain amount of distrust by all parties in the country. The appointment is an unfortunate one for the Government. This debate, short as it has been, will do some good, for it will open the eyes of the public to what we complain of in the Government of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. A. J. Balfour), whose position has been described as of such great importance, admits that he has never been a single week in our country. If anybody asked me for a definition of tyranny, I should say—"Select a man who has never been in a country for a single week, and allow him to govern it as he pleases, against the direct wishes of the people." That is what has been done here, and that is why we say that the Government of Ireland is a tyranny of the blackest kind.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I wish to ask a Question of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. I understood him to say that the suppression of public meetings, owing to the organization of rival meetings, will have his immediate attention. I wish to ask whether it is the case that the two meetings already suppressed were suppressed without his knowledge, and without the sanction of his Government, and that the Government have reversed the policy of their Predecessors, and are defending the right of free speech and public meeting.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The policy to be pursued at the meetings rests with the authorities on the spot, but the general policy rests with the Government.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Co., Mid): We are called upon to pass a certain Vote, and, for my part, I do not see why the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland should not be paid like any other servant. But what we are called upon to do is to give the right hon. Gentleman a character. That, Sir, I decline to do. Distinctly I decline to do it. The right hon. Gentleman has deliberately insulted Members on these Benches to-night. I simply say this. I got up to say it. I should dismiss the servant with his salary, giving him the worst character I possibly could.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 85; Noes 187: Majority 102.—(Div. List, No. 143.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. DILLON: I wish to put a question or two, and call the attention of the Committee to the extraordinary action of some officials of the Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland. The official to whose conduct I desire particularly to call the attention of the Committee is the Official Assignee; and a proceeding has been, and is, carried on in the Court almost, I believe, unparalleled. A reverend gentleman has been arrested, and has been imprisoned for two months for refusing to answer questions in a suit pending in the Court of Bankruptcy. At the time he was arrested, the petitioning creditor in Court desired to drop the proceedings and have done with them, and the bankrupt himself had disappeared from the country; so that both parties to the suit are desirous of an end being put to it, in which case, of course, the prisoner would be released from an imprisonment most injurious to the country, and attended with great inconvenience to the parish where he pursued his ministration and to himself. The parties concerned are willing and anxious to have done with the matter; but the Assignee persists in carrying it on. I confess my legal knowledge of the point is limited; but I suppose the Official Assignee exercises a discretion he possesses; but I do say it seems a most extraordinary provision. It seems flying in the face of all common sense that there should be this deadlock and expense and general inconvenience, and that it should be maintained in spite of the wishes of the parties directly concerned. I propose to move a reduction by a sum—I do not know exactly what the salary of the Official Assignee is—but I will move a reduction by the sum of £600, to enable us to mark our opinion with regard to these transactions.

Dr. Tunner

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I rise to Order, Mr. Courtney. I believe the Official Assignee is not paid out of the Votes at all, but by fees from the Court.

MR. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman expresses a belief. Perhaps we can be informed if this is so or not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He is not paid from the Votes; he is paid by fees from the Court.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Is the official wholly paid in this way, or only partly?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Wholly. I believe his salary has nothing to do with the Vote.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: In that case, I would ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the rules relating to the regulation of the Court and the Official Assignee have yet been published? He will remember my putting a number of Questions on the point. Have the new rules been published yet?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The rules to which I referred, and as to which I did not promise, for I had no power to do so, have not yet been promulgated. The officials, at the invitation of the Lord Chancellor, have already drawn up certain rules.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: When is it probable they will be published? It is now several months since the question was raised.

MR. HOLMES: Not several months, I think. It was during the course of the present Session. I shall be glad to obtain the information.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): I think the doctrine of the Chief Secretary for Ireland has taken us by surprise. We are entitled to the opinion of the Law Officer as to whether the Official Assignee is paid as the right hon. Gentleman suggests. I am of opinion that the salary is settled by Act of Parliament; and, if I recollect aright, only a portion comes out of the Court dues. I think we are entitled to the opinion of the Attorney General for Ireland as to whether the Official Assignee is a paid official of the Crown in Ireland.

MR. HOLMES: The way in which the Official Assignee is paid is by a percentage of the money collected by the Court, not by Court fees. I think the hon. Member will find there is no money on the Votes for the purpose.

MR. T. O. HARRINGTON: We quite recently had a discussion under the Estimates where an Official Assignee had his salary supplemented by a Vote of the House in addition to his fees.

MR. DILLON: I am not quite clear whether we can raise the discussion under some item of the Estimates. The statement of the Attorney General for Ireland makes it extremely desirable there should be that discussion, for that statement throws a flood of light on the motives actuating the Official Assignee in insisting on prolonging proceedings neither Party has any desire to prolong. Of course, if his fees depend on the proceedings going on, it is perfectly possible the official may be acting from grossly unworthy motives, and to this I am anxious to invite the attention of the Committee, for it is nothing short of a public scandal.

MR. HOLMES: I apprehend that the great object in this system of payment is that the Court may collect as much money as possible. The reason is to encourage the Assignee to realize as much assets as possible.

MR. T. O. HARRINGTON: Of course, Sir, we understand that, and of the ordinary administration of the Bankruptcy Court we do not complain. But this is a case in which proceedings having been commenced in the Bankruptcy Court, the petitioner himself wishes to retire from the case, and, refusing that permission, the Official Assignee persists in keeping the case in Court, in spite of the debtor and creditor concerned. If these proceedings are going to be sanctioned, I hope it will not be without the conduct of this official being made the subject of an expression of opinion here. It is a state of things calculated to excite the gravest discontent at the system of administering this branch of justice. I deny that in ordinary cases such a proceeding would have been resorted to, and it is only applied in this instance because something of a political character has been imported into the case. The official, influenced by his views in relation to the Plan of Campaign, takes a course he would not take in an ordinary case. So we have this anomalous state of things, that the case is at an end, so far as the parties are concerned, for the man who commenced the suit refuses to go on with it, and one of the witnesses is in gaol, detained there for not answering questions in reference to a bankruptcy not really before the Court at all. We do not see even how it is in the power of the Judge to release him. It would seem that the prisoner is to remain there for ever; for I believe it was a decision of one of the Lords Justices that such an imprisonment could not come to an end until the prisoner answers the questions. We complain that all this state of things has been precipitated by the misconduct of the Official Assignee, and we want some assurance that the question shall be closely looked into and a remedy applied.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): One of these Official Assignees—a gentleman recently appointed—is a Tory of a very strong type—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The discussion is becoming irregular. It appears that the hon. Gentleman is about to impugn the conduct of an official whose salary is not provided for in the Estimates; and, therefore, it would be irregular to discuss it.

MR. CHANCE: There is a sum of £50 having reference to the accounts of Official Assignees under sub-head B of Vote 23. I do not know whether that would make the discussion regular?

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think it would.

MR. P. McDONALD (Sligo, N.): I can point out a means by which we can legitimately discuss this question. I quite admit with the Attorney General for Ireland that the Official Assignee is paid by percentage; but there is another duty arising out of his administration, and that is the proper checking of the accounts of the Official Assignee. The checking of these accounts is expected to be made by officials of the Court of Bankruptcy who are paid out of the Estimates, therefore, on account of this, I claim the right to discuss the manner in which this checking has been done. In 1859 we had an Official Assignee, Mr. Hall, who left that position owing to the Court of Bankruptcy £5,804. That seemed a grave deficiency on his part at the time and it would have been expected—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I thought the hon. Gentleman was going to point out a way in which the conduct of the Official Assignee in respect to an imprisonment for contempt of Court could be called in question. I do not see the connection of the matter he appears to be entering upon with that matter.

MR. P. McDONALD: I may, perhaps, go more briefly to the point. This deficiency arose from the fact—

THE CHAIRMAN: I wish the hon. Member to explain exactly how he connects his observations with any Vote before the Committee?

MR. P. McDONALD: The Vote includes a portion of the salaries of officials of the Court of Bankruptcy, whose duty it is to check the accounts of the Official Assignee, to see that the Official Assignees have duly reported the payments made, and the manner in which they have appropriated them. I maintain it is from the want of this checking, a duty for which the public pay, that reports were not made to the Court of Bankruptcy, and, in consequence of this neglect, deficiencies have arisen. I have mentioned that so late as 1859 one of the Official Assignees—

MR. HOLMES: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member; but I cannot understand what officials he is referring to. So far as I am aware there is no payment for the auditing of these accounts coming within these Estimates.

MR. DILLON: The point we wish to bring under consideration is one that impugns the action of the Court, what we consider a very serious maladministration of the law in the Irish Bankruptcy Court. Surely it will not be contended when the entire machinery of that Court is in the Estimates we are debarred from raising this? I am not lawyer enough to say what official is responsible for this maladministration; but I do not suppose it is intended we should be shut out from debating a serious failure of justice when the whole of the expenses of the Court appears on the face of these Estimates?

THE CHAIRMAN: I am not quite sure to which maladministration the hon. Member refers. Is it to the case of imprisonment for contempt?

MR. DILLON: No.

THE CHAIRMAN: Then when did this other maladministration happen?

MR. DILLON: It is that of which I complained at first, and out of it arose the imprisonment for contempt, that in the Court of Bankruptcy, proceedings having been instituted by a creditor for recovery of debt, the petitioner, subsequently, through his solicitor, desired to withdraw from the proceedings; but the Court and, as I believe, by the influence of improper motives, would not allow proceedings to stop, and they go on ad infinitum so far as we know.

THE CHAIRMAN: This maladministration, assuming it to be such, is totally distinct from that raised by the hon. Member for North Sligo (Mr. P. McDonald).

MR. DILLON: Quite.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is the matter involving the imprisonment for contempt of Court, and it cannot be discussed under the Vote as it appears to be due to the action of the Official Assignee, who is not provided for by the Vote, and there are no grounds for calling attention to it.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: We are not pointing to this conduct of the Official Assignee. I will show in a moment how important it is to draw attention to this matter. We are pointing to a case tested in the Court of Bankruptcy, and the petitioning creditor in this case wishes to withdraw—he has abandoned his position. But the case goes on. He has no money to meet the expenses incurred in Court by the proceedings going on, and the House will have to vote the money, as I suppose we are voting money for similar cases. We have to vote money for maintaining litigation that both parties wish to drop.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is quite impossible to discuss the matter on this Vote.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: On the point of Order, Sir, as regards the Official Assignee. Having regard to the fact that the Official Assignee is not paid directly by this House, whether he is not responsible to the Judge, whose salary is directly concerned in the Vote, will it not be possible to discuss the conduct of the Assignee?

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand that the Judge himself is powerless in the matter.

MR. DILLON: No, Sir. On the previous occasion you ruled that we could not discuss the conduct of the Judge when I was under the impression we could do so, not appreciating the disinction between the Vote of the Committee and the charge on the Consolidated Fund. I submitted at once to the ruling; but the charges for the Courts are voted in the Estimates, and I believe that we might discuss the conduct of the official of the Court of Bankruptcy.

MR. P. McDONALD: If I might be allowed to call attention to the case of Mr. James, I think it would directly and immediately show that there has been a want of the performance of duty on the part of an officer of the Court in not checking the accounts of Mr. James, and that the Official Assignee became a defaulter under circumstances we might discuss.

THE CHAIRMAN: The case introduced by the hon. Member for North Sligo is totally alien from the other point under the notice of the Committee, and has no reference to it. Imperfectly informed, as I am, I am not able to say whether it could or could not be discussed. The substantial point raised was in reference to the committal for contempt, the action of the Official Assignee, and that apparently does not come within the cognizance of the Committee, as the salary of that official does not come in the Vote.

MR. CHANCE: In reference to the committal for contempt, there is an item for the expenses of the Court messengers who went down to arrest the rev. gentleman, in the sum we are voting, together with the expenses of conducting Father Keller to gaol. Will it not be open to the Committee to discuss the circumstances under which such expenses were incurred?

THE CHAIRMAN: No; I think that connection is much too remote.

MR. DILLON: I submit to your ruling, Sir, in reference to the committal and detention of Father Keller; but I do trust the Government will give us some concession in the matter I will now bring forward. I recently visited my friend in prison, where he has been for two months. There is not a man in Ireland, I do not care what his politics may be, who has not the greatest respect for this gentleman, and does not believe that he went to prison from high and honourable motives. I found that he was being treated in a way that is perfectly disgraceful and a public scandal. I found that he is locked up in a small room for 22 hours out of the 24, and obtains two hours exercise in the prison court. I may speak upon this, for the Vote includes £20,000 for Irish Prisons. The prisoner shares with another a very small room, and when taking exercise by marching round a yard, is not allowed to speak under pain of being reported for punishment. I could hardly believe that a man in his position could be so treated as if he were a criminal. He is not in prison for any crime, he is not a prisoner in the ordinary sense; he is simply detained on technical grounds, not having answered questions put to him. It is a monstrous scandal that this gentleman should be treated like a felon; and if the ordinary rules do not meet the case, then a special rule should be applied, and he should be allowed reasonable exercise, and to receive visits in the evening; in fact, he should be treated without that gross brutality to which he has been subjected. The Government will facilitate the passing of the Vote if they will get up and say frankly that this gentleman shall be treated with humanity and every consideration consistent with his detention. I may say that the Rev. Father Keller never wrote to me, or made any complaint of his treatment; and I was perfectly horrified to find the treatment to which he had been subjected, and I asked him why he did not write to me, that I might bring the subject to the attention of the House. I feel considerable confidence that if I had an opportunity of bringing the matter under the attention of the Government, they would no longer tolerate such a condition of affairs.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I can give no pledge to the hon. Gentleman, beyond the one I have already given. When this question was brought before the House on a former occasion, I promised that I would inquire into the whole question of prison accommodation and rules. That pledge I now repeat, but I cannot go beyond it.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: If the right hon. Gentleman has given that pledge, has he taken any steps whatever to carry it out? It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to take his time in making these inquiries; but let him remember that all this time there is confined in prison one who stands infinitely higher in the hearts and estimation of the Irish people than the right hon. Gentleman is ever likely to stand, and that that man is having all kinds of indignities heaped upon him. I say that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is calculated to inflame the minds of Irishmen against your system. After his attention has been called to the treatment extended to one who stands foremost amongst the Irish Priesthood, who has been specially honoured by his Bishop since his imprisonment commenced, and who will, undoubtedly, one day be himself a Bishop of the Diocese of Cloyne, the Chief Secretary, although he promises to inquire into the matter, allows several weeks to pass without commencing his investigation; he does not take the trouble to inform himself how the rev. gentleman is being treated. Perhaps he will relegate the duty to his right hon. and gallant Colleague, to whom he has already entrusted the task of answering Questions, and then we shall see the Champion Orangeman of Ireland going down to the gaol to inquire into the treatment of Canon Keller. Now, Sir, it is a very singular fact that while the Prisons Act of 1877 compels the Prisons Board to make provision for the treatment of prisoners detained as first-class misdemeanants, no rules whatever have yet been drafted by the Prisons Board in Ireland under the provisions of that Act. Of course, it does not matter how they treat their ordinary prisoners. If it is only an ordinary prisoner—say, for instance, an Irish Member of Parliament—the Board can pursue that line of conduct with impunity, and this House will approve and applaud the conduct of the Governors in heaping indignities upon him. But, Sir, I would point out that Canon Keller is not imprisoned for contempt of Court; he is merely imprisoned under a statutory provision in the Irish Bankruptcy Act enabling the Judge to detain any witness who refuses to answer a question put to him. It is a mere statutory power of detention; it is not imprisonment for contempt; yet a gentleman detained under such a provision is, for 22 out of every 24 hours, locked in a miserable little cell, and shut out from air and exercise, while during the two hours he is allowed exercise he has to march round a ring, like a horse in the hands of a trainer, a warder being put in the centre of the circle to keep order among the persons allowed this exercise. Do you think that such a system of imprisonment, that such a method of treating rev. gentlemen in that position, of treating ministers in whom the people have so much confidence, is calculated to endear your system of administration to the Irish people, or to make men loyal? No doubt when the rev. gentleman comes out of gaol he will speak very strongly on your system of administration. What on earth is the reason for treating in this manner two clergymen who have committed no offence, who cannot by any possibility defeat the ends of justice, and who cannot defeat the process of law in any way? Why should these two clergymen, while taking exercise in the same yard, be prevented speaking to one another? I cannot see how the Prisons Board can possibly justify their action. In no country in the world, except Ireland, would such a system be tolerated. You would not dare treat a clergyman imprisoned for similar causes in England in this way. No; it is only the Irish people that you dare insult in that way. Now, Sir, quite recently we had occasion to bring the case of Canon Keller before the Courts in Ireland by an application for Habeas Corpus to go to the Superior Courts. To do that it was necessary for us to communicate with him. We found that the Prisons Board—who were supposed to have special rules for the treatment of prisoners such as these—would not allow Father Keller facilities for seeing his counsel. Such an extraordinary state of things could not occur in any other civilized country. If you have a man in gaol awaiting his trial for a crime, however serious it may be, you allow his solicitor, or counsel, to have free access to him for consultation with reference to his case. But here you have a clergyman detained, not for any crime—not even for contempt of Court—and what do the Prisons Board say to his application for permission to see his counsel? They say, if you were awaiting your trial for a crime, however heinous, you should have every freedom to see your solicitor or counsel, but because you are not a criminal, because you have committed no offence, we cannot deal with your case, and we must deny you the right to see your counsel in private. If he comes to see you there must be a warder present, to listen to your conversation, and to check it, if, to his untutored mind, it appeared to be his duty to interfere. I say that such a system is calculated to bring discredit and disgrace upon your system, and to perpetuate the hate which already exists in the minds of the people against that system. But, in addition to his treatment in prison, I feel bound to call attention to the manner in which the rev. gentleman was arrested and dragged to gaol, which affords another example of your vicious system of government. The officers of the Bankruptcy Court, when they ordered his arrest, knew very well that Canon Keller had no knowledge whatever of the affairs of the bankrupt in reference to which he was called.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The question is the treatment of Father Keller in prison. The hon. Member is going beyond that.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: I did not intend to do anything of the kind, Sir. I was referring to the circumstances of the Rev. Canon's arrest, because I happened to be a witness of it, and I took it to be a portion of his gaol treatment. But I need not pursue the subject further. I can only say that I am surprised at the manner in which the Government have treated our remarks on this subject. I do not know anything calculated to reflect more discredit upon them than that at a time when they are endeavouring to make special provision for the repression of crime in Ireland, they should offer an open and deliberate insult to the people of that country by detaining this rev. gentleman as a prisoner, and by preventing him free access to his counsel, simply because he is not in gaol on a criminal charge or for contempt of Court. I hope that the Chief Secretary for Ireland has not said his last word on this subject; it would, indeed be a serious thing if he allowed it to go forth to the country that he was unable to interfere in this matter. The Prisons Board is in no way responsible to the people of Ireland; they may be said to be the creatures of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Fully a month has elapsed since he promised to inquire into the statement as to the treatment in prison of these rev. gentlemen; he has not yet done so; are we to understand that he is unable to devote his very great mind to inquiring into this very small matter of detail? Are Father Keller and Father Ryan, under these circumstances, to be left in gaol until their healths are broken, and to be sent back to their people in a state which will invoke curses upon your system of prison treatment?

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I venture to join in the appeal of my hon. and learned Friend. Let them consider the principle underlying this imprisonment. I maintain it is not intended to be punitive. Here are Father Keller and Father Ryan—men accustomed to lead healthy lives—locked in a cell 22 out of 24 hours. Is not that punitive? Is it not calculated to break down their healths? My experience in life tells me such treatment constitutes a very great punishment, and one which invariably produces serious constitutional effects, wherever it is prolonged to any extent. The Prisons Board is, I am informed, composed of three men, the Chairman being the Hon. Mr. Burke, whose removal is recommended by the Prisons Commissioners, because they found him to be so entirely out of sympathy with the times. This Board met in Dublin, and it was recommended that the rules governing Father Keller's imprisonment should be considerably relaxed, and that he should be allowed two or three additional hours' exercise daily; but the recommendations were never put into effect. The House would like to know why that is the case. No doubt the very rigorous imprisonment will be most detrimental to a man like Father Keller. He desired to see me, and I went to the prison, but I was turned away. The Prison Governor refused to allow me to see him. I do not complain of the action of the Governor, he was most courteous; but I do quarrel with the prison rules. I do think no rule should compel Father Keller to see the prison doctor when he prefers his own. This is an example of how the prison rules are interpreted. The Prisons Board, like other Irish Boards, is an autocratic body; it is not responsible to the people. I appeal to the Chief Secretary for Ireland to use his influence with the Prisons Board. If the Government had a spark of intelligence they would not hesitate to relax these rules and make them as lenient as possible, and not make a man, who is undoubtedly a political power in the country, more of a martyr than he has already become through their action. The Government seem to have no idea of taking into consideration what are the motives actuating a man in Father Keller's position, they ignore the feelings of the people among whom he lives and by whom he is beloved. It is not to be denied that in every constitutionally governed country it is the duty of the governors to try and find out what are the reasonable aspirations of those over whom they are placed and to secure that, as far as possible, their legislation shall come within the spirit of those limits. But the very opposite line of conduct marks the acts of the British Government in Ireland. I would appeal, Sir, to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to descend from the pedestal on which he has placed himself, and to consider these matters which affect poor mortals. Let him give his great mind to see how things are managed in Ireland, and if he will only devote some thoughtful consideration to it, he will acquire a more intimate knowledge of the men over whom he is placed.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I have risen for the purpose of pointing out to the Government the extremely unfair position in which they put English Members by taking part Votes on account. If we discuss in fulness any Vote to which we have objection, we put ourselves under the suspicion of desiring to obstruct the Business of the Government; but if we allow large sums of money to be voted without question we put ourselves in the position of not doing justice to our constituents. There are several Votes and several matters involved in the Vote on Account which I have already raised by Question in this House, and in regard to some I have given Notice of my intention to raise a discussion of them when the Estimates are considered. I do not intend to do it at this stage; but if, on another occasion, it is found necessary to take a Vote on Account instead of submitting the Estimates in the ordinary way, I give notice that I must, at any risk, raise the points I wish to have discussed.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I really think that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland cannot have considered the question. If it be true that a month ago an appeal was made to him relative to the treatment of this Gentleman—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Although a statement to that effect has been twice made, I was unwilling to interrupt hon. Members. But it is a fact I never made any such promise with regard to Father

Keller, nor did I say anything on this matter a month ago. A few days ago, while the Committee was on the first clause of the Crimes Bill, I gave a general pledge to look into the question of prison administration.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: Father Keller's case was mentioned more than a month ago.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: But it is the fact that two rev. gentlemen are at this moment in prison in Ireland. At this time too, there is a clergyman in an English prison for contempt of Court. I know for a fact that the treatment in the two cases is as different as possible. If this is to continue how can the Government hope to reconcile Ireland to British rule? Can there be any rhyme or reason for the supercilious answer of the right hon. Gentleman? Surely he might give us some comfort by assuring us that there will be expedition used. In my opinion, there ought not to be an hour lost in which the feelings and indignation of the Irish people can be justifiably aroused, yet the right hon. Gentleman will leave the Committee in doubt as to whether he has already initiated an inquiry, or whether he proposes doing so before Whitsuntide. He does not give us the slightest indication that in his mind he deems this question to be one of urgency. There are, I believe, few questions which more appropriately might engage the immediate attention of Parliament than the treatment of gentlemen confined under these conditions in Irish prisons.

MR. CHANCE: Two Irish priests are in prison charged with no offence whatsoever; they are subjected to considerable indignity; for 22 out of 24 hours they are locked in a miserable damp room, what little exercise they are allowed they have to take as felons, and if for the whole two hours they do not choose to keep on their feet they are led back to their rooms and again locked up. The letters which they receive and write are opened; if the contents are considered objectionable they are suppressed. I can perfectly well understand why these two priests are detained in prison. It is because they have advocated a certain Plan of Campaign. The Government tried to tackle that plan in the open with the powerful weapons of jury packing, a paid public Press, and a full bar of Crown lawyers. They failed miserably; and, therefore, they took the most despicable course of catching Catholic clergymen, asking them questions they would certainly refuse to answer, and treating them as felons for that refusal. I would remind the Committee that these priests, in refusing to betray their Plan of Campaign, acted precisely in the same way as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) when he refused to betray his Plan of Campaign.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! order! The hon. Member is suffering himself to wander very far from the subject.

MR. CHANCE: I understood that the subject was the treatment in prison of Father Keller, and I wanted to point out the causes which, in my opinion, led to that treatment. I also wanted to point out that there were no rules specially framed for the treatment of these prisoners, and to suggest it was in the power of the Castle Authorities to frame such rules. If that line of argument is out of Order, I will not proceed with it.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have instructed the hon. Member that he is perfectly at liberty to discuss the treatment of these gentlemen in prison.

MR. CHANCE: It is perfectly impossible to carry on the discussion in that way. This is the third or fourth time to-night that Irish Members have found it impossible to raise distinct and important issues. I trust that the Government will have the manliness to meet us in open fair square fight, instead of acting in this miserable, mean, and degraded manner.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): Will the Government say whether the treatment of a clergyman confined in England or Scotland for contempt of Court, is the same as that to which Father Keller is subjected. There is now a clergyman imprisoned for contempt of Court. Does his treatment differ in any way from the treatment accorded to Father Keller?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I have no reason to believe that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. Abrahams) has stated what is incorrect. I have no knowledge of the facts of the case, but I believe the treatment is of precisely the same character.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): My information is from the public prints, and there it was stated that this clergyman is allowed to see his friends, and that every luxury is provided for, and every consideration shown to him.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I wish to say a word or two on what strikes me as a legal matter arising out of this Vote, on which I should like to hear the opinion of the Attorney General for Ireland. I put a Question on the matter a few days ago, and it does appear to me to be a very important subject. As I understand it, there are two classes of prisoners who are treated in a somewhat exceptional manner—untried prisoners, and what are called first-class misdemeanants. It is perfectly plain that persons who are committed for refusing to answer questions do not come within either category—they are not untried prisoners, because they are charged with no offence, and cannot possibly be tried; they are not committed for contempt, because that is not the form of the warrant under which they are held in custody, and the statistics under which they are committed do not describe their offence as contempt of Court. That being so, I wish to be informed why the Prisons Board have taken it upon themselves to treat these gentlemen as if they had been committed for contempt of Court? For my part, I deny that the Board have any right whatever to do so. It seems to me that these persons constitute a third and perfectly distinct category of the prisoners whose case is not met by the prison rules as they are at present drawn up. That being so, and these being privileged prisoners, as I may call them, and the Prisons Board having been put, in a certain sense, to choose whether they would treat these gentlemen as untried prisoners, or prisoners committed for contempt, I want to know why they have selected the severer régime? I respectfully submit that it was perfectly open to the Board to have treated these gentlemen as untried prisoners, a category which is quite as applicable to them as the other. The section under which they are imprisoned does not describe their offence—if I may call it an offence—at all as contempt of Court. It simply authorizes the Judge before whom they may be examined to commit them to prison for refusing to answer questions, and that is altogether different from the ordinary cases, either of persons committed for contempt by the High Court, and by the Common Law power which the Inferior Courts have. I hold, therefore, that the Prisons Board have exceeded their powers in this matter; or, at any rate, they have exercised, and are exercising them, if they have any discretion, in a perfectly unwarrantable fashion. I say it was perfectly open to them, when they were deciding in what manner these gentlemen should be treated, to have said—"As the law stands they are not convicted prisoners, nor untried prisoners, nor persons committed for contempt, and we will put them in the category of untried prisoners." This is a very important matter. We have been for several weeks past discussing the 1st section of the Crimes Bill. [Cries of "Order!"] I think this is perfectly relevant; because the persons who are committed for refusing to answer questions at the secret inquiry will be in exactly the same position as the two gentlemen who are now in gaol. The section of the Petty Sessions Act under which prisoners will be committed for refusing to answer at the secret inquiries are equally silent as to the category in which these persons will be placed in prison. It does not describe the offence as contempt of Court, but leaves the question of treatment for the Prisons Board to decide. That being so, I ask the Attorney General for Ireland, whose attention I drew to this matter some time ago, to explain to this Committee on what ground the Prisons Board took it upon themselves to say that these prisoners are prisoners committed for contempt of Court, and to refuse to rank them as untried prisoners.

MR. HOLMES: I do not wish to prolong this debate; but with reference to the question which has been asked me, my answer, I hope, will be satisfactory to the hon. Gentleman. This question has not now arisen for the first time. Ever since the year 1859 this has been a matter which, from time to time, has had to be dealt with by the Prisons Board and the Irish Authorities. From that time down to the present, persons who have refused to answer questions in the Higher Courts have been treated as if they were committed for contempt of Court. And for a very good reason, because they are committed for contempt of Court. The Superior Courts require no Statute. When a witness will not answer he is committed; but when a Statute called into existence the Bankruptcy Court in Ireland, power was given to imprison persons for not answering questions, just as the Superior Courts have power to commit for contempt of Court—

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: But the power to commit in the Bankruptcy Court is a distinct power.

MR. HOLMES: Yes; but the two things do not differ in the slightest degree, and if a witness declines to answer questions the offence is really of the same character as contempt of Court. It is essentially a similar offence. You cannot draw any distinction; and, therefore, as I say, the rule which has been followed since 1859 is justifiable.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON: I can assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland that he is very much at sea in this matter. I do not complain of that, for we all know that the Bankruptcy Law is a thing which very few lawyers go to the trouble of studying. But if he will examine the matter, he will see that there is the greatest distinction between an ordinary case of a witness refusing to answer a question and a witness committed for contempt. The two things are treated in different ways. There are two different Schedules attached to the Bankruptcy Act setting out two different forms. One of them, Schedule W of the Act of 1867, sets forth the refusal of the witness to answer. The other, Schedule Y, is the form of warrant for the committal of a person for contempt. If the two things are one and the same, the draftsman would not have thought it necessary to put two separate Schedules to the Bill giving two different forms of warrant. The fact is, that under the old Bankruptcy Law there was this power to imprison a witness who refused to answer, or to sign his depositions, and the whole of the depositions had to be set out in the warrant for his committal. What took place was this—that a section was introduced in the Act by which it was made unnecessary to set out the depositions in the warrant; and it became only necessary for the Judge, in making the order for the committal, to refer to the number of the question on the depositions. That is precisely the case in Father Keller's imprisonment. The question is set out on the face of the warrant numerically, thereby taking the offence out of the category of contempt of Court. So it is treated by the Judges. I have been arguing the question during the last few days before the Judges of Ireland, and they are not disposed to dismiss it in the very summary way which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland wishes to do now. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may allow me, also, to point out that the Prisons Act of 1877 gave power to the Prisons Board to make orders in cases of this kind, and there is no need to go back to 1859, and to say that the practice then followed has been continued up to the present time, when the additional powers given to the Prisons Board in 1877 are taken into consideration. What I complain of is, that while there are two sets of rules to meet the case of prisoners who have not been tried, or prisoners who are not sentenced for any definite offence, the Prisons Board have elected to treat Canon Keller and Father Ryan under the most severe of those sets of rules. The first-class misdemeanant was originally the imprisoned debtor, and, of course, no one can deny that there must be some question of punishment attached to imprisonments of that nature. Then there is the case of prisoners awaiting trial who are allowed certain privileges to which the first-class misdemeanant is not entitled, such as full access to his counsel and his medical adviser, and the right of free correspondence. The person committed for contempt is, on the other hand, restricted to a great extent as to his correspondence, nor is he allowed free access to his counsel or his medical adviser. Could there be anything more absurd than to contend that one whose offence is not sufficiently great to place him within the category of committal for contempt of Court is not to have the same right as a man who is charged with a heinous offence, but who has not yet been brought to trial? If these rev. gentlemen were in prison awaiting trial on a grave charge, they would have free access to their counsel and medical adviser, and free correspondence. These privileges are denied because the Prisons Board refuse to carry out an Act of Parliament, and indignities are inflicted upon them which were never contemplated at the time the Bankruptcy Act was passed. I do not think we should be doing justice to our constituents if we were to rest content with the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, and I think we are entitled to a further answer. I, therefore, beg to move that you report Progress.

VOL. CCCXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. T. C. Harrington),—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

COAL MINES, &c. REGULATION BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Stuart-Wortley.)

[BILL 130.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I rise to appeal to the Government in the very strongest manner in regard to this Bill. Considering the large number of people who are interested in it, its extreme importance, and the unexpected way in which the second reading was taken, I wish to ask the Government whether they will not put it down for some date when we can have an adequate discussion upon it? I do not see that it is possible to have such adequate discussion this side of Whitsuntide, and in the absence of any assurance that they will give us facilities before Whitsuntide, I beg to move that the order be postponed until the 9th of June, which, I believe, is the Thursday immediately after the re-assembling of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Committee be deferred till Thursday 9th June."—(Mr. J. E. Ellis.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): If it is the wish of hon. Gentlemen that the Order should be definitely postponed until the 9th of June, the Government will offer no objection.

Question put, and agreed to.

I

TRUSTS (SCOTLAND) ACT (1867) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 225.]

(Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland, The Lord Advocate.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON) (Bute): In moving the second reading of this Bill, I wish to make only one observation. We propose in Committee to bring forward Amendments to simplify and extend the scope of this Bill merely to this extent. Instead of enabling the trustees to go to the Court for powers under this Bill, we propose that the trustees shall have some power without going to the Court at all; and, in the second place, we propose that clauses should be inserted which will have the effect of ratifying reductions of rent which may have been given by the trustees on their own motion.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland),—put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

PARISH ALLOTMENTS COMMITTEES BILL.—[BILL 170.]

(Mr. Cobb, Mr. Channing, Mr. Fuller, Mr. James Ellis, Mr. Herbert Gardner, Mr. Thomas Ellis.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I feel that it would not be right at this very late hour that I should detain the House with any explanation of this Bill, which has been for some time before the House. I believe that some Bill of this sort will command the approval of all parties in the House, and the only object I now have in view is to do something towards putting this allotments question at least one stage forward. In the hope that the Government will give an assurance that that is also their intention, I will confine myself to moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Cobb.)

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): I beg to move the adjournment of this debate, on the ground that it is wholly impossible at this hour to discuss a Bill of this importance. It has 62 clauses; it deals with every parish in England, with few exceptions; it establishes a Corporation in every parish, and enables those Corporations to borrow money and acquire land without the consent of this House, on the security of the Poor Law Fund. I only mention these few points to satisfy the House that this is a Bill which ought not to be proceeded with in this fashion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Radcliffe Cooke.)

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I wish to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House to use his influence with his followers to induce them to withdraw this Motion. This Allotments Question is one that is well understood by nearly every Member of this House. It is a subject in which great interest is taken by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House. The hon. Baronet the Member for East Norfolk (Sir Edward Birkbeck) has a very useful Bill before the House, and he has received very great assistance this Session from my hon. Friends here. I myself have done what I could to assist the passage of that Bill, and if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) could say a word to ensure the second reading of this Bill, we might, perhaps, find time for more ample debate.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. Smith) (Strand, Westminster): No one feels more interested in this question of allotments than I do and have done, and this feeling is shared entirely on these Benches. The Government have an Allotments Bill of their own, which will deal with the question much more effectually and thoroughly than the Bill of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cobb). The hon. Member only asks us for an assurance that we should give this matter one step forward. We believe that will be best secured by the consideration of a measure which is about to be introduced in "another place," and which, we hope, will be passed through this House during the present Session. The machinery with which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cobb) has clothed this measure we deem to be unsatisfactory; and, therefore, I hope the hon. Member will consent to postpone this Bill until he can see our own measure, which we believe will be thoroughly satisfactory to both sides of the House.

MR. COBB: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) will, I am sure, give me credit for only trying to do what is in my power to push this question forward. It will, perhaps, be also within his memory that a month or five weeks ago I asked him whether, seeing that an Allotments Bill was promised in the Queen's Speech, he would not bring it forward at once, and consent to that, as well as the large number of other Bills before the House on the subject, being referred to a Select Committee, so that the work of allotments might be going on. I am quite willing to accept that now, and not to take a Division. Otherwise I feel that I must resist the Motion for the Adjournment of the debate.

MR. FINCH-HATTON (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I want to say one word on this question of the adjournment of the debate, being equally interested with the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Cobb) in the question. On the distinct understanding from Her Majesty's Government that if we agree to the adjournment of the debate to-night they will not only introduce their Bill into the other House, but proceed with it here this Session, I shall support the Motion for the Adjournment.

MR. NEWNES (Cambridgeshire, E., Newmarket): I beg to point out that the hon. Member who has brought forward this Bill has not received the assurance he asked, that the Bill of the Government and the other Bills shall be referred to a Select Committee. This is a question of the deepest possible importance to the rural districts of England, and we should be very much better employed in dealing with it than in coercing the Irish people. At all events, I hope that unless the hon. Member receives a distinct and emphatic assurance that this question will receive the attention of the House he will refuse to accept any compromise.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It is quite impossible for the Government to give any such assurance. They cannot consent to refer this Bill to a Committee, and the reason is obvious. The Government have prepared and are ready to introduce to Parliament a Bill of their own, which deals with this subject in a more satisfactory manner than this present Bill does. Holding that opinion, it is out of the question for the Government to assent to the second reading with the idea of referring the Bill to a Select Committee. I can assure my hon. Friend behind me that the Government are prepared to deal with the subject at once. No time will be lost in introducing it into the House of Lords, and we hope it may pass into law this Session. It would not be in Order for me to discuss the provisions of the Bill now. The hon. Member says it has often been discussed before, and that there is a practical agreement upon it; but I think what there has been a practical agreement upon is that there shall be a Bill dealing with the question of allotments. The principle of this Bill has not been under discussion, that principle being that the parish shall set up an authority, with full power to deal with the matter. All I have to say on this point is in reference to the observation that in principle this Bill has been assented to. What has been assented to is that there should be an Allotments Bill; the Government are pledged to that, and the Bill will be introduced.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I have hope that opinion has made some progress on the other side, since in the last Parliament we had an Allotments Bill opposed very much on the same grounds by the Party opposing this Bill now. Again, we have the assurance that the Government have a better Bill ready. But we have not seen the Government Bill, and we do know that the principle of this Bill commends itself to many of us on this side. We recollect, also, that we are not receiving the support we hoped for from the professed friends of the Allotments Question. We ask only for a decision upon the principle, and that being denied us, we must take a Division technically upon the adjournment; but which will be accepted as a division on the principle of the Bill of my hon. Friend.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I only wish to say that the Government, by the action of one of their own supporters, have been prevented from stating what their objections to the Bill are, and that is a most inconvenient state of affairs. It may be a bad Bill, it may be a good Bill, I will not discuss it now; but I wish to point out that all we have is a promise that at some time some Bill will be introduced in "another place." Meanwhile, the Government stand uncommitted on this Bill. We want then to state their views, and give reason for their "Yes" or "No" to the Bill. I would appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury to induce his supporter to withdraw the Motion for Adjournment. We desire to have the views of the Government stated, and the country desire it. When it learns that a Motion from an hon. Gentleman sitting immediately behind the Government Bench prevents the Government from expressing an opinion, the country will draw its own inference from the occurrence.

Mr. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) I am bound to protest against the course of the Government. The whole time of the House is taken up by Irish affairs and when an opportunity occurs of doing useful work in a matter vitally important to England it should not be less. The argument of the President of the Local Government Board that the Bill of the hon. Member for Rugby brought in a novel principle—the principle of a popularly elected body—is precisely the reason why this Bill deserves full consideration. Before we go to a Division I should like to ask how it is that we hear from the Government about the introduction of a Bill in "another place" only when this Bill happens to be unblocked upon the Orders to-night? I hope the Government will see their way to inducing the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion, and not give their assistance to burke the free discussion of this question in the face of the whole country.

Mr. OLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): If this Motion is not withdrawn, the understanding is that, practically, the Division is upon the principle of the Bill. The Government have shown they are trying to dodge the agricultural labourers; but we can hold them to this question until they pronounce their opinion distinctly.

OPEN SPACES (DUBLIN) BILL.—[Bill 80.]

(Mr. William Radmond, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. Murphy, Mr. Dwyer Gray, Mr. Timothy Harrington.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to move the second reading of this Bill. The chief objects for which this Bill was intended are provided for by the Metropolitan Open Spaces Extension Bill, which has passed the third reading in this House, and which applies to Ireland; but this Bill contains certain provisions that the Local Government Board did not think desirable to embody in the general Bill; they apply specially to Dublin, and will materially assist Lord Ardilaun and his Committee in their efforts to create recreation grounds by enabling old laneways and passages which have become only nuisances to be closed up. I trust there will be no objection to this stage, and ample time will be afforded for the consideration of the clauses which are proposed to be embodied in the Bill before the Committee stage is entered upon.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Murphy.)

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet): The Government had hoped that the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act sufficiently dealt with this subject; but as hon. Members seem to think there are some points not dealt with applicable specially to Dublin, and that the Bill is in accord with some project of Lord Ardilaun, the Government will not oppose the second reading, reserving, however, full liberty of action in reference to the next stage.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday 9th June.

MOTIONS.

NATIONAL DEBT AND LOCAL LOANS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Bill to amend the Law respecting the National Debt and the charge thereof on the Consolidated Fund, and to make further provision respecting Local Loans, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 266.]

FOREST SCHOOL.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to consider whether by the Establishment of a Forest School, or otherwise, our woodlands could be rendered more remunerative.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of Eighteen Members.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That the Minutes of Evidence taken before the Select Committee on Forestry, in the Sessions 1885-6, be referred to the Committee.—(Sir Edmund Lechmere.)

SAVING LIFE AT SEA.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on Saving Life at Sea that they have power to inquire and report as to the fittings and appliances on board British Merchant Ships, with a view to the safety of life.—(Baron Henry de Worms.)

LAND TRANSFER BILL.—(No. 57.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Halsbury) said, the object of the Bill was to meet a real and substantial grievance, which he believed existed at the present time, and which prevented the owners of land from enjoying proper facilities for disposing of their property.

One serious difficulty which stood in their way was the perpetual necessity for the examination of the title which had to take place, every time land, however small the parcel, was transferred. It was with a view to get rid of that grievance, and not in order to yield to any popular clamour, that the measure had been introduced. The measure would not abolish settlements or wills, but was designed to prevent litigation in respect of estates tail in future, and would in regard to transfer abolish—as far as possible—the distinction between real and personal property. Without departing from the main lines of the Bill, he was desirous, as far as he could, to meet the suggestions which had been thrown out by both his noble and learned Predecessors in Office, and that he had endeavoured to do by means of a number of clauses, which were of course of a technical nature, and could not be suddenly put before the House so as that their Lordships should be able to understand them at once. He therefore proposed to commit the Bill pro forma in order to have the Amendments printed together with the Bill, and to postpone the discussion in Committee until after the Whitsuntide Holidays.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee." — (The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly; Bill reported without Amendment: Amendments made: Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House; and to be printed as amended. (No. 105.)

REGISTRATION OF DOGS IN THE METROPOLIS BILL.—(No. 73.)

(The Lord Mount-Temple.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD MOUNT-TEMPLE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the measure would not interfere in any way with the existing laws and regulations in regard to dogs, but it proposed some additional precautions for dealing with them. There was a large number of homeless dogs wandering about the streets of the Metropolis. Experience both in England and in other countries showed that the muzzle was to a great extent a failure, and it was very seldom that a mad dog was seen with a muzzle on. In the early stages of rabies it was well known that a dog became very nervous and much distressed; he shrank from noise and the light, and his instinct was to hide himself from human supervision. When the disorder was becoming more serious he might escape from his master's house into the street. Sometimes also a dog managed to displace the muzzle with his paws. He argued that not only did muzzles prevent dogs lapping water, but they hindered breathing to some extent in hot weather. As far as he had studied the matter, therefore, it seemed to him that muzzling dogs to prevent rabies was a delusion and a snare. The Bill provided that after the 31st December, 1887, a dog found in any public place within the Metropolis not wearing a collar and badge shall be deemed not to be under control. Every householder or occupier of any house, or part of a house, must make and sign a return of the number of dogs kept within seven days of the demand for such a return being made by the chief officer of police for the district. The chief officer of police in every district must provide a register containing the particulars relating to all dogs kept by persons residing in the district. Every person keeping a dog must have it registered, and on the receipt of the license shall receive an official badge indicating the number of the dog on the register and the year to which the number is applicable. No dog shall be permitted to appear in any public thoroughfare without a collar having a badge; and the fact that an animal was found without the badge would be prima facie evidence that the animal had no owner, and might be taken charge of and destroyed. It is not necessary that the registered number of a dog shall be changed when a dog is transferred from one owner to another, but the person who becomes possessed of a dog with a registered number must give notice of the change of ownership within three clear days to the principal police office of a district. This system had been found to work well in Vienna and other places, and he thought that it would obviate the necessity of muzzling. Every person keeping a dog which shows symptoms reasonably inducing a suspicion of rabies must give notice to the chief officer of police for the district, who shall cause the animal to be examined. If found to be suffering from rabies the dog will be destroyed; if not, it will be returned to the owner.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Mount Temple.)

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK) said, the noble Lord had taken somewhat unnecessary trouble in addressing to the House an argument which did not meet any of the points to which objection had been taken. If it had been proposed to apply the Bill to the whole Kingdom there might have been a good deal to be said for the tone he had adopted in regard to the muzzling of dogs generally. It was, however, a Bill dealing only with the Metropolis, and the remarks of the noble Lord were somewhat outside the question. Opinion was not at all settled, as the noble Lord seemed to suppose, as to the question of muzzling. The noble Lord had spoken of what he regarded as the injury done to dogs by the system of muzzling; but his opinions were by no means accepted by experts. Both humanely as respected the dogs, and safely as respected human beings, he thought it very desirable there should be an inquiry upon the subject, and he should move that evening for a Committee with that object. Various theories were advanced for rabies, and before further legislation took place upon this subject he thought that it was most desirable that they should have before them the Report of the Royal Commission on hydrophobia in human beings, and M. Pasteur's plan of dealing with it. This would leave them free to deal with hydrophobia in dogs. He did not propose to oppose the second reading, because the Bill would be comparatively harmless in its effect. Whether one of the modes proposed to be adopted for preventing wild, masterless dogs going about—which in itself was a source of danger—would be accepted by the public generally, whether people would be prepared to go to the expense of having arrangements made with the police by which the police were to take into custody all the dogs they saw with premonitory symptoms of rabies, he was not prepared to say; but, at the same time, it was one of the modes which had been adopted in Vienna. The method did not supersede muzzling, because there was no attempt in the Bill to say that one method was more efficient than another. He did not want to enter upon the question whether muzzling ought to be done away with altogether or not, because it was a controverted question, and he would only say, therefore, that he should not be prepared to assent to the further progress of the Bill until there had been an inquiry upon the subject of rabies in dogs; so that good and sound evidence and information might be obtained as to the best mode of dealing with dogs for the prevention of disease and the protection of human beings. He was afraid that if he entered into this subject at the same length that the noble Lord had done, their Lordships would come to the conclusion that he himself required a muzzle.

LORD BELPER said, he was Chairman of the Local Authority of a county—the County of Notts—in which there had, perhaps, been more rabies than in any part of the Kingdom except London, and, in compliance with requisitions from the hospital authorities, and others well qualified to judge, they had found it necessary to muzzle all the dogs in the county; and he believed that that order, in so far as it had been enforced, had been valuable in its results. But it had not been so efficacious as it might have been, owing to the fact that it was impossible to extend the regulation beyond the actual boundaries of the county, and several cases had occurred on the borders of neighbouring counties where similar regulations were not in force. In one case in a neighbouring county, a poor boy was bitten by a mad dog and died—muzzling regulations being in force in Notts at the very time, only a few yards distant. He ventured, therefore, to call the attention of the President of the Council to this point, and asked him whether it would not be desirable to give power to extend provisions against rabies beyond county borders. He expressed the hope that the Committee to be appointed would consider whether some means could not be devised for extending the area of publication in which muzzling was to be enforced.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a.

CROFTERS' HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND)

BILL. — (No. 90.)

(The Marquess of Lothian.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of Lothian), in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it was an Amendment of the Crofters Act passed last year, and had been under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government for some time. In fact, it was prepared by his Predecessor in Office, who was now Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. As he understood, it was was not brought forward earlier because of certain difficulties felt by the Commissioners under the Crofters Act in the way of carrying the provisions of the Bill into effect. Those difficulties had now been overcome, and the Government now thought the Bill might advantageously be brought before their Lordships. Under the Crofters Act of last year, it was provided, under the 4th section of the 6th clause, that, in the case of any crofter making an application to the Commissioners for the consideration of a re-valuation of his rent, and the amount of his arrears he should be bound to pay to his landlord, the Commissioners were entitled to sist all proceedings for the removal of the crofter in respect to non-payment of rent, until his application had been determined upon by the Commissioners upon such terms as to payment of rent and arrears as they might think fit. Judging from the debate in the House of Commons upon this clause on the 5th April, it seemed to him that it had been understood by those who had introduced this measure, and also by the House of Commons generally, that it was intended, though not actually stated in terms, that the result of that clause would be that in the case of any crofter making such an application, proceedings should be sisted until the Crofter Commission had had an opportunity of considering and deciding upon his case. It turned out, however, that, by the first clause of the Act, any crofter who became a notour bankrupt was precluded from the provisions of the Act; and, therefore, whether intentionally or unintentionally, by what he might term a side wind, it was possible for any landlord who wished to do so to defeat the intention of Parliament, and to exclude a crofter tenant from the operation of the Act by taking proceedings in bankruptcy against him, and making him a notour bankrupt. He did not think that that could have been the intention of the Act of last year, because if it had been possible for the Commission to undertake the consideration and adjustment of all the applications made to them at once, this difficulty would not have arisen. But owing to the number of applications which had been made, and were likely to be made, it was impossible for the Commission to adjudicate upon them all for many months, perhaps it might be for many years. That was not the fault of the crofters themselves, neither of the landlords, who were anxious that their cases should be decided at once; but under the Act as it now stood this was simply impossible, and it might become necessary, or some landlord might feel it incumbent upon him, to proceed against a tenant by making him a bankrupt, and thus excluding him from the benefits of the Act, which were meant to be in their favour. That was only one side of the question. There was the side of the landlords themselves. He would like, with regard to this, to record his opinion that the landlords had, on the whole, almost universally behaved toward the crofters with the utmost forbearance, and had not done what the law permitted them to do, but there was a feeling of insecurity on the part of the crofters with regard to the terms of the Act. On the one hand, it would be very simple to protect the crofters from being proceeded against under this Act until the Commissioners had an opportunity of adjusting their claims; but, on the other hand, the claims of the landlords should also be taken into consideration. If it were put out of the power of the landlords altogether to proceed against any tenant for recovery of arrears until the Commission had adjudicated on the case, there was no doubt that, in many instances, the landlords would receive no rent at all for, perhaps, two or three years. The case of the crofters was that they should not be proceeded against by the landlords, so as to be deprived of the benefits of the Act. On the other hand, the landlords should not be deprived of the opportunity of obtaining rent or arrears from tenants who were perfectly able to pay. It was proposed by this Bill to meet the necessities of the case of both landlord and tenant. In the first place, under Clause 2, the Crofters Commission would have the power of prohibiting such sale by the landlord of the tenant's effects as would make the crofter a notour bankrupt until the case was finally determined by the Commission. On the other hand, if, on being proceeded against by his landlord, a crofter should make application to the Commission, the Commission were given power to make such inquiries as might be deemed necessary in order to see whether the crofter was really able or unable to pay the whole or any portion of the rent and arrears. Although the question was one of some difficulty, he hoped their Lordships would agree that the matter between the crofters, on the one hand, and the landlords on the other, had been fairly met by the terms of this Bill. The question was somewhat difficult, because the effect of this Bill could only last as long as the Crofters Commissioners were engaged in adjudicating on the applications made to them, and because, as a matter of fact, it did prevent landlords from recovering rents which might be justly due to them. But he would ask them to remember that not only this Bill, but the Crofters Act itself, had been framed to meet an exceptional state of matters; and he thought that their Lordships would not object to this Bill, which was really merely a question of giving effect to the principle which the Act of last year had been intended to carry out. In conclusion, he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Marquess of Lothian.)

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he willingly acquiesced, so far as he was concerned, in the passing of this Bill, which was brought forward with the view of carrying out what he believed was the intention and effect of the 4th sub-section of the 6th clause of the Crofters Act. Their Lordships would recollect that, under that Act, something of the same system, with regard to the valuation of rents, was applied to the small tenantry of the West and North

The Marquess of Lothian

Highlands of Scotland as had been applied to Ireland. That was to say, three gentlemen were commissioned to go over the country and ascertain how far the rents of these small tenants, under £30, were or were not excessive. Of course, they had undertaken their work at a time of very deep depression, and it naturally followed, from that power, that some restraint was placed on the landlords in respect to proceeding against their tenants for arrears of the rent which might turn out to be excessive. Therefore, the 4th sub-section of the 6th clause provided that, on the application of a crofter, the Commission might sist, or stop all proceedings for the removal of the crofter for non-payment of rent until the Commission had come and viewed his holding. He confessed that when the Act was passed, he was of opinion that, under that clause, the Commission had full power to stop all proceedings for arrears. It turned out, however, on some landlords having proceeded against their tenants for arrears, that, though the Act did stop proceedings for eviction, it did not stop proceedings for the sale of the tenant's cattle and effects; and it was found by another clause that when the cattle had been sold, and the tenant was declared bankrupt, he could be turned out of his holding. Therefore there was a back door open by which landlords might in certain cases evade the intention of the Act and turn out their crofter tenants. These were the circumstances which called for this Bill. His noble Friend the Secretary for Scotland (the Marquess of Lothian) had frankly admitted that the Crofters Commission had proceeded so much more carefully than the Commissioners had done in Ireland, that they were taking a very long time in their valuations. They were going very carefully over every farm, traversing the ground with great care, holding long sittings, taking elaborate evidence, and they were going so slowly that, as his noble Friend had said, they might take many years before they had finished their work. He hoped that was exaggerated, but he was afraid they would take some years before they went over the whole ground. They had been sitting some months in the Island of Skye alone, and had not yet overtaken half of the claims. There were some of the proprietors who could hardly afford to stand out of the whole of their rents for a long time; therefore the Government had, while they carried out the intentions of the Act and prevented the landlords from evicting, on the other hand, allowed the landlords to summon their tenants for rents which were reasonable. On application the two parties were to come before the Commission, and the Commission—upon affidavits laid before them—were to decide how much of the arrears should stand until the Commission were able to go over the grounds. There were facts which could easily be placed before the Commission which would enable them to judge whether, at least, a portion of the arrears could be paid up, leaving the remainder until the decision of the Commissioners on the application to fix fair rent. He was willing to agree to that compromise, and he gave his assent to the Bill. But he wished to take notice of a Question which was put in "another place," which, it was needless to mention, was put by one of the Members who were called the crofter Members, and who, he thought, were not always very scrupulous in their statements with regard to landlords as they might be. The Question was put in "another place" to know whether it was not true that the landlords in all the crofting counties in Scotland had intended to proceed against their tenants. Of course, that Question gave the impression to Parliament and the country, and, he was afraid, was intended to give the impression, that landlords generally were trying to evade the Act, and to take advantage of the proceedings under the 1st clause of the Crofters Act. His knowledge of the country enabled him to say absolutely that that suggestion was absolutely not true. It might be literally true that one or two landlords in the country had taken that course, but he had not the slightest doubt there were cases in which they were justified in doing so. He had read very carefully the proceedings before the Commission since the commencement, and was very much struck with the evidence given—especially in Skye—and the observations of Sheriff Brand, the Chairman of the Commission, from which it appeared clearly that many cases came before him in which crofters voluntarily withheld rent which they were perfectly able to pay. These cases had elicited from Sheriff Brand very severe, and, in some cases, very significant observations. There were some cases in which tenants had sold cattle and had not given a 6d. or 1s. of their arrears to their landlords, and others in which they had been buying boats, thus showing the possession of considerable sums of money, and withholding every 1s. of rent from their landlords. He thought in these cases the landlords were justified in proceeding against tenants by every process known to the law. He was willing, however, that these matters should be left to the arbitration of the Court, and he assented to the second reading of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, he could most emphatically confirm what the noble Duke had said, that the action of the landlords generally in the Highlands against their tenants was altogether unfounded. Several cases had been mentioned to him, but as it had been in confidence, he was unable to say who they were. With regard to the noble Duke's observations respecting the work of the Crofters Commission, he understood that the Commission would, with reference to the applications made to them from the Island of Skye, issue within the next few days 500 or 600 decisions.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

IRISH LAND LAW BILL.—(No. 58.)

(The Lord Privy Seal, Earl Cadogan.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

Moved, "That the House do again resolve itself into Committee." —(The Lord Privy Seal.)

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN said, that before the House went into Committee again upon this Bill he desired to make an appeal to the noble Marquess at the head of the Government (the Marquess of Salisbury). He (the Duke of Abercorn) and his Friends on that side of the House were most anxious to assist and facilitate the progress of this Bill, and that he believed was also the desire of noble Lords opposite; but, under the circumstances, they desired that the new clauses which the Government proposed to insert in the Bill, in the place of Clauses 21, 22, and 23 of the original measure, should be discussed pro forma this afternoon, and that then the Bill should be re-committed. His reason for making this request was that a Bill of vital importance connected with the interests of those who lived in Ireland had been introduced by the Government, of which the three most important clauses had been entirely remodelled by the Government and re-introduced. Many Amendments were to be moved on these new clauses, and the most of these Amendments had only been placed in the hands of noble Lords this afternoon. Therefore, it would be difficult—almost impossible—for noble Lords this afternoon to discuss them in connection with the new clauses which the Government had added to this Bill. Under these circumstances, he thought the suggestion he had made was not unreasonable; and he therefore hoped the Government would comply with the request he had made.

LORD FITZGERALD said, he had great pleasure in seconding the request of the noble Duke (the Duke of Abercorn), and he could assure the Government that there was no desire on his part to obstruct this measure. On the contrary, it was his desire to facilitate its progress. They could not forget the somewhat protracted Sitting of last night; and he had been greatly struck with the manner in which the House had been enabled to dispose of 20 difficult clauses of this most important Bill, involving great principles, and carrying with them great consequences. He had seen with admiration and pleasure the way in which the discussion was carried on by noble Lords whose personal interests were deeply affected by the measure. There was not an angry word or a word of recrimination; on the contrary, all was peace and quietness, and anxiety to give the measure full consideration, and an expression of willingness to sacrifice their individual interests to the public good. The Government now proposed to strike out the clauses which had been known as the Bankruptcy Clauses and to insert others of immense importance. The noble Duke had stated that the Amendments to these new clauses had only reached him that afternoon. Owing to judicial duties he had himself not yet even seen the Amendments. Under these circumstances, the House could not adequately enter upon the consideration of these Amendments, and he would suggest that the three clauses proposed to be struck out by the Government should be struck out, that the four clauses proposed to be inserted should be inserted, and that the Bill should be reprinted and re-committed. This would necessitate postponing the further consideration of the Bill in Committee till after the Whitsuntide Holidays, but the delay would not be unattended with substantial advantages. He had no motive except that of desiring to make the Bill as good as possible.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble and learned Lord (Lord Fitzgerald) had stated that it was not his desire to delay or obstruct the Bill. That might with equal truth be said of those sitting on that Bench. There were certain clauses in the Bill which they considered objectionable, and they did not as yet see that any satisfactory plan had been suggested of remedying the objections to those clauses, but they did not desire to delay or place any hindrance in the way of the measure. He thought the suggestion that had been made for the recommitment of the Bill was reasonable, and he hoped that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) would accept it.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) said, that though he should have preferred to go on with the discussion, yet the views of the course of procedure which commended itself to the noble Duke behind him (the Duke of Abercorn), to the noble and learned Lord (Lord Fitzgerald), and to the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition (Earl Granville) must be considered to be in consonance with the general opinion of the House. He proposed, therefore, to accede to the suggestion that had been made. The only way he saw of carrying out the wish thus expressed was that they should go through the Bill now pro forma, inserting all the Amendments of the Government, and such other Amendments as the Government were prepared to accept, to reprint the Bill as amended, and then to put it down for re-committal until after Whitsuntide—on Monday the 13th June.

Motion agreed to; House again in Committee accordingly; further Amendments made: The Report of the Amendments to be received on Friday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 106.)

QUESTIONS.

FIJI—PUBLIC FLOGGING OF A WESLEYAN METHODIST.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Governor of Fiji has made any Report concerning the public flogging of Zephaniah, a Native member of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in the Rewa District, for having complained of the pillage of his gardens; and if so, what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to prevent the repetition of such a barbarous punishment?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): A Report upon this matter was received by the last mail. Some damage was done to Zephaniah's garden by a party of his own friends, not for purposes of pillage, but out of high spirits. The accounts differ as to the amount of damage. Upon this he wrote a letter to a Chief, which he admits to have been insolent and improper. This so incensed a large assembly of Natives present that they demanded that he should be subjected to a Native punishment called "buturaki," which involves being knocked down and jumped and stamped upon by a crowd of angry men, which must be at all times unpleasant and is sometimes followed by fatal results. An affray became imminent, and the Chief of the town restored peace by ordering Zephaniah to receive six strokes and another man five strokes. Zephaniah himself says—"I thought I had deserved my fate and was satisfied." The rest of the story is said to be exaggeration mixed with much pure invention. The "frightful wale" said to have been visible after the whipping was caused by a burn sustained some years before.

SOUTH PACIFIC—THE NEW HEBRIDES —THE ISLAND OF TANNA.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, What notice has been taken of a Petition, dated September, 1883, and presented to Her Majesty by Lord Normanby on his return to England, addressed to Her by the Chiefs of the Island of Tanna, in the New Hebrides, objecting to French annexation, saying, that if the Island is to be annexed by any civilized Power they would prefer it to be to the Australian Colonies?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): The hon. Baronet probably refers to a Petition which was received in June, 1884, as an enclosure to a despatch from the acting Governor of Victoria. Lord Normanby does not appear to be concerned with it in any way. The Petition was forwarded at the request of a Mr. Thomas, correspondent of The Melbourne Argus, who seems to have been mainly instrumental in getting it up, and who witnessed the marks attached to it by the Natives of Tanna. The Earl of Derby informed the acting Governor, in reply, that he had laid the Petition before the Queen, but had not been able to advise Her Majesty to take any action in reference to it; and that Her Majesty's Government had no reason to suppose that the French Government had any intention of taking possession of the Island of Tanna.

FINANCE, &c. — REDUCTION OF THE NATIONAL DEBT 1886-7.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What was the actual sum applicable from all sources for the reduction of the National Debt in the course of the last financial year, including the surplus to be appropriated under the Sinking Fund; and, what was the actual figures of the National Debt (calculated according to Sir John Lubbock's Return) on 31st March, 1887, as compared with the sum of £711,788,232, as stated for the year 1886?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): There was applied in reduction of Debt during the year 1886-7—By the action of Life Annuities and Terms of Year Annuities, £904,946; small Sinking Funds, £22,145; composition of Stamp Duty, £210,000; Land Tax and surplus Land Tax, £66,051; and sundry small amounts, £1,853; and by the action of Terminable Annuities—subject to final correction—£4,756,532; and by the action of the Sinking Fund attached to the Suez Canal Exchequer Bonds, £84,900. There was a surplus of Revenue over Expenditure in the year, which, representing the old Sinking Fund, will also go in diminution of Debt—namely, £776,006, making a total of £6,822,433. The net Debt stated on the principle of Sir John Lubbock's Return stood on March 31, 1886, at £711,788,223; and according to the calculation, not yet finally revised, it will be found to stand on March 31 last at £704,789,687. Sir John Lubbock's Return for the present year will be laid on the Table of the House as soon as it can be completed.

POST OFFICE AND TELEGRAPH SERVICES—NET REVENUE.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will state the figures at which the Net Revenue—after deduction of Expenditure—of the Post Office and Telegraph Services severally stood for the years 1881 and 1887, and what is the falling off in the Net Revenue of each in the latter as compared with the former period; and, what is the additional sum which ought to be charged against the Telegraph Revenue in respect to the purchase money, and what was the net deficiency of that Revenue on such basis for the last financial year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): The figures which my right hon. Friend asks for will be presented to the House in due course; but, in anticipation, I will give them as nearly as they can at present be ascertained in the form shown in the Appropriation Accounts. In 1880-1 the net Post Office Revenue—including in the expenditure the cost of Packet Service—was £2,586,436. For 1886-7 the Estimate is £2,400,000, showing a decrease in the six years of £186,000. The Telegraph Service showed in 1880-1 a surplus Revenue of £313,284. In 1886-7, however, instead of a surplus there will, it is expected, be a deficiency of £223,110, so that in the six years there is a falling off of no less than £536,394. This is omitting the interest on the purchase money of the Telegraphs—£326,417 a-year. If this be taken into account the deficit for the year 1886-7 will be £549,527. I should add that in both cases the falling off in the Revenue is due, not to diminished receipts, but to increased expenditure. Very large expenditure, much of it of a capital nature, has been incurred in the last two or three years for the introduction of the Parcels Post and sixpenny telegrams. I am very much obliged to my right hon. Friend for asking these questions, in order to draw the attention of the public to the falling off in the surplus of the Postal Telegraph Revenue and to the large charge which the Telegraph Service now imposes on the general revenues of the country.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON WAR AND ADMIRALTY OFFICES—THE EVIDENCE.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the hon. Member for the Blackpool Division of Lancashire, Whether the Royal Commission, of which he is the Chairman, will arrange to publish at once the evidence, which is now practically completed, relating to the War Office, as, if such evidence is not published until their Report on the War and Admiralty Offices is issued, valuable information on the subject of this branch of expenditure will not be in the hands of Members for use during the present Session?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY (Lancashire, N., Blackpool), in reply, said, that the Commissioners had not yet completed the whole of the evidence on the War and Admiralty Offices, although it was very nearly finished. It was their hope and expectation to be able to present their first Report before the end of the Session. Under these circumstances, it would be quite contrary to precedent, unsatisfactory, and inconvenient to attempt to meet the wishes of his hon. Friend by publishing an imperfect and fragmentary portion of the evidence.

WAR OFFICE—INSANITARY CONDITION OF FORT BURGOPYNE, DOVER.

MR. PRESTON BRUCE (Fifeshire, W.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether a "further minute inspection" has been made into the sanitary condition of Fort Burgoyne, at Dover, as promised by him; and, if so, with what result; whether troops have been quartered in these barracks since the cases of fever which occurred there recently; and, whether the 4th Brigade Royal Artillery (Fife Militia) are to be quartered in this fort in June and July?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: Examinations have been made, both by the Medical and Engineer Departments, without discovering any cause which will account for the recent cases of typhoid fever at Fort Burgoyne. Arrangements have, however, been made for an independent examination by an expert of the Local Government Board, which may, I hope, result in the discovery and removal of any insanitary condition. Three companies of the 2nd Battalion East Kent Regiment were quartered in the Fort until the 12th instant, when the battalion went to Lydd for training. It is intended, if there be no objection on the part of the Medical Department, to accommodate the 4th Brigade of the Scottish Division Royal Artillery in Fort Burgoyne, so far as its construction will permit, the remainder of the corps being encamped close at hand.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—AN "UNACKNOWLEDGED FLOATING DEBT."

MR. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give the House any information as to the existence and magnitude of an "Unacknowledged Floating Debt" which has been incurred by the Egyptian Government, according to the statement of Mr. Wilfrid Blunt in The Times newspaper of 11th May?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir J. FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The Egyptian Government have no "Unacknowledged Floating Debt," and are entirely free from advances in account current from banks or other establishments of credit.

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' PROTECTION SOCIETY—COLONEL KING-HARMAN, M.P.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can state if the report in the Margate newspaper, Kells's Gazette, of April 9th is correct, in which report it is stated that the Margate Licensed Victuallers' Protection Society held their annual dinner at the Cliftonville Hotel on the previous Thursday, at which festivity the chairman of the evening was supported by Colonel King-Harman, M.P.; that, as the evening advanced, and—

"As an extension of time had not been obtained, Colonel King-Harman at this stage asked the company to become his guests, and the chairman vacated his seat;"

and that, eventually,

"the company separated shortly before midnight;"

and, whether he can inform the House if the police have taken any notice, intend to take any notice, or ought to take any notice, of these proceedings?

Mr. Northcote

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: The Secretary of State has received a letter from my right hon. and gallant Friend, who tells him that the facts are as stated in the Question. The landlord had forgotten to ask for an extension of time; and at five minutes to 11 o'clock, as there was still a portion of a musical programme to be completed, my right hon. and gallant Friend was informed that it was competent for him, as a resident in the hotel, to invite all or any of the party to remain as his guests, which he did. The subsequent proceedings lasted about half an hour. The head of the Margate Police was in the room, and made no suggestion of illegality. The Secretary of State has no control over the local police. He is not aware whether they have taken, or intend to take, any notice of this occurrence. Any complaint as to their conduct should be addressed to the Local Authorities.

WRECK COMMISSIONERS' COURTS, HULL—NAUTICAL ASSESSORS.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will arrange that local nautical assessors be appointed in future to attend the Wreck Commissioners' Courts when held in Hull, so as to avoid travelling expenses and delay in obtaining nautical assessors from Cardiff, Swansea, &c.?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: The practice has been the reverse of that suggested by my hon. Friend; and its policy is that the assessors should be, as far as possible, independent of all connection with the localities in which the cases arise upon which they have to exercise their judgment.

POST OFFICE, DUBLIN—THE FEMALE TELEGRAPH STAFF.

MR. T. O. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour) asked the Postmaster General, Why the supervising appointment granted to the Dublin female telegraph staff last December has not yet been filled, and if it is true that a junior is performing the duties at present; and, if so, whether this is with a view to appoint her permanently over the heads of six senior clerks equally qualified?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): The supervising appointment to which the hon. Member refers is one of importance, and several persons are being tried in turn with a view to test their capabilities for the post. This will require time; and no statement can at present be made, either as to the date on which the vacancy will be filled, or as to the person who will be selected to fill it.

MR. T. O. HARRINGTON asked, was it not a fact that the junior in the Office, to the exclusion of the six seniors, had been selected for this trial?

MR. RAIKES: I am not aware in what turn persons are being tried; but I have no reason to believe that the trial will be confined to one person.

FINANCE, &c.—THE NATIONAL DEBT.

MR. MASON (Lanark, Mid) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Statement showing the total amount of the National Debt as at 31st March, 1887; what portion of the permanent charge of £26,000,000 will be paid for interest; the sum payable for Terminable Annuities; the sum payable for management; and how much will be available for the reduction of Debt?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): Yes, Sir, the fullest possible information will be laid upon the Table with regard to the matters which form the subject of the Question. The Treasury minute explaining my proposals with respect to the Debt Charge will be in the hands of Members immediately, and it will be found to contain all the information sought by the hon. Member.

INLAND REVENUE—INCOME TAX ON PROFITS EARNED BY FOREIGNERS.

MR. MASON (Lanark, Mid) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will inform the House by what means the Government propose to levy Income Tax on the profits earned by foreigners in this country who have no places of business here?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): This question is still before the High Court of Justice; and I can add nothing to the reply which has been already given to the hon. Member on this subject.

ADMIRALTY—CONVERSION OF THE ROYAL MARINE ARTILLERY INTO MARINE INFANTRY.

COLONEL HUGHES - HALLETT (Rochester) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is in contemplation, as reported, to do away with the Royal Marine Artillery, and convert that highly-trained force into Marine Infantry?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): There is no truth in the rumour to which my hon. Friend refers, that the present Board of Admiralty propose either to abolish the Royal Marine Artillery or to amalgamate it with the Marine Infantry.

SOUTH AFRICA—ZULULAND.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Zulus requested the British Government to defend them against the Boers; and whether they have prayed to be placed under the protection of British Sovereignty?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): I am glad the hon. Baronet has asked this Question, as it enables me to explain my short reply of yesterday, from which it might have been supposed that this Sovereignty had been suddenly sprung upon the Zulus. Zululand came under the paramount authority of Her Majesty at the end of the war in 1879, and that fact was fully recognized by the Zulus. The Zulu Chiefs, frightened at the encroachments of the Boers, whom some of them had invited into Zululand, did ask us to defend them. We undertook to negotiate with the new Republic, which had been recognized by the late Government, and a line of boundary has been settled. On February 8th, the Chiefs were informed by Mr. Osborn that British protection, carrying with it the supreme authority of Her Majesty's Government, was to be extended to Eastern Zululand. I telegraphed on February 12th for information as to the feeling of the Zulus, and received an answer on the 14th, giving Mr. Osborn's opinion that the majority of the Chiefs, including Umnyamana, would gladly accede, that the people would be specially glad of British rule, the only obstacle being the opposition of Ndabuko. Again, on the 15th, I received a telegram from Sir Arthur Havelock, stating that Mr. Osborn had just telegraphed to him that a favourable answer had been received from Dinizulu and Ndabuko, as well as the other Chiefs, with regard to the agreement. Then, and not till then, Her Majesty's Government approved of Mr. Osborn's action.

CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN—FIRE-WORKS IN THE LONDON PARKS.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the following paragraph in The Daily News of 16th May:—

"We understand that although the Government have obtained a grant of £17,000 for the fitting up of Westminster Abbey, the War Office Authorities have stopped the orders which had been given for a display of fireworks in the London Parks on the night of the Jubilee Celebration. Steps had been taken to provide such an entertainment for the public in Hyde, Regent's, Battersea, and Victoria Parks ;"

whether it is true that the War Office Authorities had given orders to certain pyrotechnists for a display of fireworks to take place on the night of the Jubilee Celebration in Hyde, Regent's, Battersea, and Victoria Parks ; to whom such orders were given ; what were their pecuniary amounts ; what was the reason for countermanding them ; in what manner, whether by letter or otherwise, they were countermanded ; and, what reasons for countermanding them have been assigned to the persons entrusted with the orders ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) : Certain firms were consulted by the War Office relative to a display of fireworks in the Parks named, and were told to submit a programme. This step was taken in consequence of the near approach of the Jubilee, and the probable large demand for fireworks. Her Majesty's Government, however, having decided that there should be no display of fireworks in these Parks, these firms were informed by telegraph of that decision.

Sir Henry Holland

ALDERSHOT—ALLOWANCE TO THE YEOMANRY CAVALRY.

MR. HERMON-HODGE (Lancashire, Accrington) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to grant any pay, or make any allowances to, members of the Yeomanry Cavalry attending the approaching Review at Aldershot ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) : This matter has been very carefully considered ; and it has been decided that it is not possible to give any extra allowance to regiments of Yeomanry Cavalry for attending the Royal Review at Aldershot.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART (SCOTLAND)—THE VOTES.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether, considering the strong feeling evinced upon the subject in Scotland, he can inform the House what progress has been made in putting the Votes for scientific purposes in that country on a more satisfactory foundation, in accordance with the representations made by the Royal Society and other learned Bodies to the Secretary for Scotland in April last ?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities) : This matter is engaging the attention of the Secretary for Scotland, who has laid it before the Lords of the Treasury, who have at present the subject under consideration.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND) — SUP-PRESSION OF PUBLIC MEETINGS IN ULSTER.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true, as stated in this morning's papers, that the Government have decided to proclaim an anti-coercion meeting announced to be held this week in the town of Dungannon, County Tyrone ?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said : I have had no information to that effect.

MR. DILLON : Will the right hon. and gallant Gentleman inquire ?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Yes; I will inquire, and let the hon. Member know in the course of the evening.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): Perhaps some other Irish Officer in this House will give us some information on the subject. May I ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he knows anything about it?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): No, Sir. A matter of that kind would not come under my notice.

MR. DILLON: The Question is, whether meetings in Ireland are to be proclaimed without the knowledge and consent of any responsible Minister sitting in this House? I want to know who is responsible?

MR. HOLMES: It is done, of course, under the direction of the Chief Secretary.

Several Nationalist MEMBERS: Where is he?

MR. DILLON: Let us know where the Chief Secretary is. We were informed last night—[Cries of "Move the adjournment!"] I do not desire to unduly take up the time of the House; but in view of what occurred last night, this is a curious illustration of the inconvenience of the obstruction offered to Irish Members. I merely wish to say, with the indulgence of the House, that I have asked this Question without Notice, because it is a matter of immediate and urgent importance. I am told that this meeting cannot be proclaimed without the consent of the Chief Secretary, and we were told last night that the Assistant Secretary answers with the fullest responsibility for the Chief Secretary. But now the right hon. and gallant Gentleman informs us that he knows nothing whatever about it, and I therefore want to find out in what way we are to get any information on the subject.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): My right hon. Friend has had no Notice of this Question, and my right hon. and learned Friend on my right (the Attorney General for Ireland) also had no Notice of the Question. If Notice had been given half-an-hour or so ago, an intimation would have been given to the hon. Member. I will take care, Sir, that in the course of the evening an answer is given.

VOL. CCXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

[The CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. Balfour) here entered the House.]

MR. DILLON: Perhaps the Chief Secretary would now be kind enough to answer the Question asked in his absence.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give Notice of the Question.

MOTION.

JUBILEE SERVICE IN ST. MARGARET'S CHURCH.—RESOLUTION.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Sir, I rise to move—

In making this Motion I do not propose to support it by any argument or by any statement of facts. If I were to attempt to do so I am conscious that I should weaken the sense of obligation and thankfulness under which, I believe, hon. Members in all parts of the House desire to take part in this religious service. On occasions like this silence is more eloquent than words; and I therefore submit the Motion, with confidence that it will be accepted with complete unanimity.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I desire, Mr. Speaker, with perfect concurrence and pleasure, to second the Motion which has been made by the right hon. Gentleman. I agree with him that it requires no lengthened explanation; and I am satisfied that it will be received with general concurrence by the House, and will not lead to an expression of any difference of opinion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to put a Question to you, Mr. Speaker, upon a point of Order. I wish to know, whether you can inform the House of the exact terms of the Motion made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury some time ago, giving preference to the Crimes Bill? Is it not the case that the Crimes Bill must be the First Order of the Day, if it is to obtain precedence on Tuesday? I am not in possession of the exact terms of the Order, and therefore I shall be glad if you will cause the Order itself to be read—I mean the Order which gives precedence to the Crimes Bill on Tuesday.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. and learned Gentleman will look at the Paper he will find that the First Order of the Day is the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill. The Motion which the right hon. Gentleman has just made was put on the Paper in the place it occupies by my direction; because, in the first place, it affects the proceedings of the House, and it is for the general convenience of the House that the Motion should be made now. I am informed that more than 400 Members have signified their intention to be present.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As a Catholic, I, for one, have no objection to the Motion, and I have no doubt that it will meet with the concurrence of the House. I will only remark that in a House which contains so many Irish Members from Ireland, it is greatly to be deplored that the 50th year of Her Majesty's Reign should be signalized by the passing of a Jubilee Coercion Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, in celebration of the Fiftieth Year of Her Majesty's Reign, this House will attend at the Church of St. Margaret, Westminster, on Sunday next, the 22nd of May.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 217.]

(Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 13th May.]

[EIGHTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PRELIMINARY INQUIRY.

Clause 1 (Inquiry by order of Attorney General).

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 12, at end, add, „ committed in a proclaimed district whether committed before or after the passing of this Act, provided that no inquiry shall be held under this section concerning any offence punishable under this Act committed in any district before the proclamation of such district, unless such offence would have been indictable if this Act had passed.”—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): This Amendment provides that offences to which the section applies committed in a proclaimed district, whether committed before or after the passing of this Act shall be the subject of inquiry provided that no inquiry has been held concerning an offence punishable under the section committed in any district before it was proclaimed, unless such offence would have been indictable if the Act had not been passed. Now, it seems to me that that provision is somewhat unintelligible unless it means that an inquiry is to be held into offences committed in a district, whether the district has been proclaimed or not. I wish to point out that the Government have had another Crimes Bill under which they were able to hold an inquiry into any offence committed previous to August, 1885, and I think it would be most unreasonable to make this preliminary inquiry apply to offences committed before that date. I will, therefore, move as an Amendment to add to the clause the words “unless such offence was committed since the expiry of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1882.”

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To add at end “and unless such offence was committed since the expiry of The Prevention of Crimes (Ireland) Act, 1882.”—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES (Dublin University): I have no objection to the words proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question, “That the Amendment, as amended, be added to the proposed Clause,” put, and agreed to.

MR. HOLMES: I have now to move a further Amendment to provide that every summons shall be in the form contained in the Schedule, and that every warrant to commit a witness to prison for refusing to answer a question shall set out the question which the witness refused to answer.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 12, at end, add, "(10.) Every summons under this section may be in the form in the Schedule to this Act, or to the like effect. Every warrant to commit a witness to prison for refusing to answer a question put to him on an examination held under this section shall set out the question which the witness refused to answer."—(The Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) The summons itself, I presume, may be susceptible of Amendment. In this proposal the form of the summons is in reality left in blank. May I ask if this is the proper moment to discuss the summons?

THE CHAIRMAN: No; the form of the summons will be discussed on the Schedule.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I wish the Government to take notice of the fact that I propose to move an Amendment in regard to the form of the summons when the Schedule is reached. I now come to the second portion of the Amendment which applies to the warrant. I presume that this Amendment has been put down by the Government in fulfilment of the pledge given by the Attorney General for Ireland to the Committee that the Court shall have full knowledge in dealing with a witness committed for contempt, for refusing to answer a question put to him, of what the question was which the witness refused to answer. As the law stands at present no warrant to commit a witness for contempt in refusing to answer a question gives the Court any power unless the question was a lawful one which the witness refused to answer. All the Court would do would be to receive a warrant regularly setting forth the question; but it would have no further power except to ascertain, in the first instance, that everything connected with the warrant was regular, and that the witness was not entitled to refuse to answer the question put to him on examination. The Government have rejected an Amendment to provide that the questions shall be lawful questions, and as the clause now stands there is nothing to restrict a magistrate from putting unlawful questions. For instance, a magistrate might ask a witness in an inquiry for wilful murder—"Was your child vaccinated?" and if the witness declined to answer, and was committed to prison, that question would appear on the face of the warrant. Of course, it would be open for the Court to say that it might afford some clue in regard to the murder whether the child had been vaccinated or not; but it is very like the old saying of the strawberry mark on the arm. I am of opinion that unless the Government will consent to add something to the words now proposed, the present Amendment will be entirely illusory.

MR. HOLMES: The object of the Amendment is to give the means of quashing an illegal order of commitment. I may point out that the law on the subject is that where the committal has been made by a Court of inferior jurisdiction, it is necessary to show on the face of the order what the ground of committal was. By the general law it will be requisite to show that a summons had been duly issued specifying the character of the crime and the ground upon which the witness had been sent to prison—namely, that he had declined to answer a question put to him. It was pointed out that, although the offence would be mentioned in the warrant, still the Court would hardly be in a position to judge whether the commitment was justifiable unless the question the witness had refused to answer appeared on the face of the warrant. Under those circumstances, I said that the Government had no objection to the question being set out, and if it should appear that there was no jurisdiction in the Court below to put the question, the warrant could be quashed. That is the intention of the Government, and in the Amendment on the Paper it is provided that the Court shall inquire whether the magistrate properly exercised his jurisdiction. If it can be shown that the magistrate exceeded his jurisdiction, then, of course, the warrant would be quashed, and the magistrate himself would be liable to an action. That would be the position of the magistrate; but, at the same time, it is desirable to place him in a position that will enable any complaint as regards what occurred on the inquiry to be considered by setting out what the question was which the witness refused to answer. We certainly cannot consent to throw upon the magistrate any greater responsibility on an inquiry under this section than would be entailed upon him in an ordinary inquiry.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I think the proposed Amendment is very objectionable in the form in which it stands. The Attorney General for Ireland says that the inferior Court must show that it had jurisdiction to put the question, and that if the warrant does not show that the magistrate had jurisdiction, the magistrate himself would be liable to an action. No doubt that would be so in an ordinary case, but in the case of a warrant of this kind no crime would be specified, and there would be no person accused. In the case of an ordinary warrant, there is a crime specified and a person accused, and the warrant stating the crime would afford the accused an opportunity of showing whether the magistrate had jurisdiction or not. In this case you have neither a crime specified nor an individual accused, and therefore the Court would have no means whatever of testing, on the face of the warrant, whether it had been issued within the jurisdiction of the magistrate or not. The first part of the Amendment states that—

"Every summons under this section may be in the form in the Schedule to this Act, or to the like effect."

I cannot imagine how it is possible to use more objectionable words. As they stand, it would undoubtedly be held by the Court of Queen's Bench that the magistrate had power to commit a man under any warrant and under any form of summons. I will move the omission of the word "may" in the first line in order to substitute the word "shall."

MR. HOLMES: I have no objection to the Amendment; but the one word involves the other.

MR. CHANCE: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman will look at the Registration Acts, he will find that the word is "shall," and not "may."

Amendment to the said proposed Amendment, to omit the word "may," and insert the word "shall,"—(Mr. Chance.)—put, and agreed to.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I had hoped to get from the Attorney General for Ireland some statement as to what he conceives to be the language of the Amendment. Quo ad the decision which was arrived at some days ago, in my opinion it is perfectly valueless, and does not advance the matter one jot. It does not provide or indicate that the Superior Court is to enter into the whole matter, but the law is left entirely as it stood. Is it intended that the Court of review shall have the shorthand writer's notes before it? Is there any objection to that?

MR. HOLMES: I believe that in this Amendment I have given what I proposed to give, and all that I proposed to give.

MR. CHANCE: This Amendment, if carried, will decide the question as to what is to appear on the face of the warrant. It has already been ruled that, as far as the form of summons is concerned, it shall be decided on the Schedule. Is it not desirable that the same course shall be taken in regard to the warrant—namely, that every warrant issued under the section shall be in the form contained in the Schedule? I think it would be for the convenience of the Committee if that course were adopted, and, therefore, I will move the omission of all the words after the words "Every summons under this section may be in the form in the Schedule of this Act, or to the like effect."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To omit the words "Every warrant to commit a witness to prison for refusing to answer a question put to him on an examination held under this section shall set out the question which the witness refused to answer."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. HOLMES: The form of the warrant is given in the Petty Sessions Act to which reference has been made.

MR. CHANCE: The warrant given in the Petty Sessions Act cannot possibly be used for this purpose, and for this reason, that the warrant in that case states the offence, it gives the names of persons, and a number of other things, which cannot possibly be stated in a warrant committing a man for refusing to answer a question in this preliminary inquiry. If such a form of warrant is used it will only involve trouble in future. How can you fill up a warrant stating specific names, when the very essence of the preliminary inquiry is to discover whether a crime has been committed, and who committed it? I think it is only reasonable that the question should be postponed until we reach the Schedule. We are making substantial progress with the clause, and we have every desire to assist the Government. Nothing could be more reasonable than to accept this simple Amendment, which only postpones the matter until the proper stage for entertaining it is reached.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn): I wish to point out to the Attorney General for Ireland that the Amendment, as it stands, is absurd, because it says that the warrant shall set out the question. The investigation may, however, involve a great number of questions—for instance, as to what the witness has been doing for several weeks. He may be asked—"Where were you on a particular day?" and he says—"I decline to answer." How could the Court judge, from that question, whether it was a question a witness was bound to answer under the Act? In the Court of Chancery, when a witness is asked a question, and refuses to answer, it is necessary to set forth the context of the examination, and unless this is done in this instance, it is impossible to determine whether the witness refused to answer a question which the magistrate was entitled to put. I am sure the Attorney General for Ireland will see the force of what I am pointing out. To give one question alone would, in many cases, be altogether absurd. I, therefore, hope that the Government will consent to the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member, and that the form of warrant shall be contained in the Schedule, and shall set forth what it was substantially that the witness refused to answer. It is quite evident that a certain portion of the examination must be set out, in order to show the relevancy of the question the witness refused to answer.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): While I am of opinion that the Attorney General for Ireland has met the promise he made the other day, and while I think the statement of the question would enable the person challenging it to raise the matter in another Court, I submit there is some slight inaccuracy in the view put forward by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that it will be sufficient to adopt the form of warrant already set out in the Petty Sessions Act. I do not think that that form can be adopted here, and there must be a special form to meet the requirements of this measure. We are, therefore, only wasting time in discussing the matter. If we are going to provide that the form of summons is to be specified in the Schedule, I think it would be better to provide, also, that the warrant shall be set forth in the Schedule. A form of warrant used in other cases cannot apply literally to this clause.

MR. HOLMES: It would not apply literally, but if you give a new form of summons the warrant would follow that summons. This is the third time that this question has been discussed, and if it is now allowed to stand over until the Schedule is reached without taking a Division upon it, in all probability there will be a fourth discussion.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I am anxious to save the time of the Committee, and I will, therefore, ask the hon. Member, who moved the Amendment, if it is really necessary that he should press it. The Attorney General for Ireland, as I understand, has agreed that the warrant shall set out the question. I do not quite understand when the question is set out what the Court is to do; but I do not believe the Court would allow itself to be baffled when a question has been sent up to be dealt with; but that it would insist on having brought before it all the particulars affecting the question. It is quite evident that there must be a new form of warrant if a common form of warrant would not do; but I think that all these matters may be left over to a later stage, because any decision we may arrive at now would not conclude the matter at all. Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway have already obtained a considerable concession in the fact that the warrant is to set out the question which the witness has refused to answer.

MR. CHANCE: I am willing to withdraw the Amendment providing it is perfectly understood that I shall not be precluded, at a later stage, from raising the form of the warrant which is to set out the question "the witness refused to answer." The form of warrant will be a very large question indeed, and must be discussed either on the Report or on some stage or other of the Bill. I think the Government would be well advised if they left it over for discussion until the Schedule is reached, rather than take it upon the Report stage, because upon the Report the matter would be more elaborately and more formally discussed. I think it would be for the convenience of the Committee that it should be raised on the Schedule. If, however, the Government do not choose to take that course, it is their own fault if further discussion arises.

Amendment to proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The Amendment as it now stands provides that the warrant shall set forth the question which the witness has refused to answer; but there is nothing to compel the person drawing up the warrant to specify the offence in relation to which the witness has been committed. I would ask the Government to consent to add these words at the end, "and shall specify the offence in reference to which the inquiry has been held."

MR. HOLMES: A warrant of this character would not hold water for a moment, unless the offence is distinctly set forth.

MR. CHANCE: I would remind the Attorney General for Ireland that a warrant was issued under Forster's Act, which ran in this way—

"To commit a man to gaol for having been reasonably suspected of having at some time or other, at some place or other, committed some offence against the peace of Her Majesty the Queen."

If we are to adopt the form of warrant used in the Petty Sessions Act I do not see how it can be made available, because it is not at all relevant to a case of preliminary inquiry. This, however, is a miserably small wrangle upon minor matters, and if the Government really want to act squarely, it would be easy to give an assurance on this small but very reasonable point, and not to prolong a discussion when we want to arrive at more substantial points.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I beg to move to add in page 2, at the end the following Proviso:—

"Provided that no examination under this section shall be held in respect of any matters relating to public meetings, or transaction relating to the letting, hiring, or occupation of land, or the dealing with, working for, or hiring of any person in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation."

In moving this Amendment it will be my object, although I feel that it is a difficult one, to keep clear of other parts of the Bill. I will try to do so as far as I possibly can. Everyone will perceive this, that this first clause includes all the offences under the Bill, and the question I desire to raise is that there should be certain things which may be created offences under the Bill which shall not come under the operation of this clause. A Division was taken the other night upon the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for York (Mr. Lockwood), which specified certain offences to which alone the clause should be applicable—such as murder, arson, and so forth. The Committee decided against the Amendment, but the Amendment I now move has a different scope. It will be seen that it admits the application of the clause to all offences except those specified in the Amendment; but then those are offences which are within some of the clauses of the Bill, and to which, I venture to submit to the Committee, legislation of this kind should not be applied. The first observation I will make is, that the favourite argument that this was done in 1882 cannot be applied, at all events, to this argument, because the Bill of 1882 did not introduce as an offence the matter of conspiracy, such as is found in Clause 2, Sub-section 1, of this Bill; and, therefore, there is no question of making inquiry into questions of conspiracy. A similar clause in the Act of 1882 also excluded that part of this Bill which refers to public meetings. Therefore, it will be seen that there is no question of the application of the Act of 1882, either in regard to conspiracy or to matters relating to public meetings. In the provisions of the Criminal Code as introduced into the House by Sir John Holker, to which reference has frequently been made, it was distinctly admitted that these private inquiries were not to be of universal application, and that they were to be applied only to offences to which they might be considered appropriate. In the Code of 1882 there was an express exception of all offences except those in which a man might be arrested without a warrant, a term which indicated that, in regard to the classification of offences, there were certain offences which could only be dealt with by summons, and which would not be subject to a private inquiry of this kind. It would seem to be unwise and unjust to make inquiries of this kind extend to minor offences, and expose people to an investigation into all the circumstances of their social and private life. The popular representation of this Bill is that it is directed against crime, and, in the case of Scotland, which has been cited in justification of the measure, it is thoroughly understood that these inquiries must be directed against crime. Now, people understand by crime murder, arson, outrage, moonlighting, cattle maiming, and so on; and it is to such crimes that these inquiries may be properly applied. It is not necessary for my argument that I should enter into the discussion of this point at this moment. I admit that it is so, but that is not the point which I desire to raise. What I ask is, will the Government be content with that? If they be content to direct this inquiry against that which is popularly understood as crime, then they may get on very fast with their Bill. It is one of my principal objects to get at the mind of the Government on the subject—to know what are the purposes and what are the objects to which they intend to direct these powers; and I hope we shall have from them a frank and a clear statement on this subject, which may very much facilitate this discussion and considerably shorten our labours. If the Government say that they do not intend to apply this power to murder, outrage, moonlighting, cattle maiming, and so on, but that they mean it for something else, then I would ask what else? The Attorney General for England stated the other night that the Government mean to direct this power against Boycotting. Let us go a step further. What do they mean by "Boycotting?" Do they mean "intimidation?" There, again, I should not feel inclined to take issue with them, but do they mean by "Boycotting" combination? Again, I put the question pointedly to the Government, and I ask for an answer, and a plain answer, to it. Do they mean combination apart from intimidation—the intimidation which was dealt with in the Trades Unions Act of 1875, which contains a definition of intimidation. A second question I ask the Government is—Do they mean to apply these powers to combinations in reference to land, in reference to dealing, in reference to labour, and so forth, which have not been an element of intimidation? I am sure the Government will admit that we ought not to allow the Bill to be passed for one offence, and actually to be used for a purpose totally different. Therefore, we have a right to understand exactly, plainly, and clearly what it is the Bill is intended to be used for. To my mind, the expressions contained in the Bill are very suspicious. In the first sub-section of Clause 2 the conspiracies and combinations are set out, and they are kept altogether separate from violence and intimidation. The intimidation section is Sub-section 2; but the section which relates to conspiracy and combination is Sub-section 1, which has no reference in it to intimidation. I can, therefore, only conclude that the Government are directing this Bill against combinations which are not combinations of intimidation. Otherwise, why do they make that distinction? It is quite plain that under Sub-section 1 the Government may deal with combinations which are not combinations of intimidation at all. Combinations for purposes of Trades Unions have been declared by Act of Parliament to be lawful. It was found necessary by Statute to declare them lawful, because the Judges had declared them to be unlawful; and, therefore, the words which the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland has put on the Paper to meet that objection—namely, "which would be punishable by law"—do not help the matter at all, because they simply throw the tenants of Ireland back into the position of workmen before the Act of 1875—that is to say, that they are subjected to the law affecting Common Law conspiracy without protection. To show what dangers people may be exposed to under Common Law conspiracy, I will simply quote a passage from a very high authority—a friend of mine, Mr. Wright, who is well-known to all lawyers, and whose book was of great assistance to us in the contest we engaged in some years ago in regard to Trades Unions. Those Trades Unions' discussions were founded upon the necessity of making clear, and, to some extent, overruling, the decisions of the Judges, and more especially the decision which had been given in the case of the gas-stokers. Mr. Wright says that in the old days it was a criminal offence to break a contract between master and servant, and this was laid down to be the law—that to break down a contract of that character was a criminal offence; but if there was not evidence of a conspiracy, it was not held that the breaking of a contract, or a combination to break a contract, was any offence at all. It cannot be maintained in law that a combination to break a contract is a criminal offence, and yet that seems to be what is indicated in the 1st subsection of the clause, where it says—

"Any criminal conspiracy to compel or induce any person or persons not to fulfil his or their legal obligations."

What do the Government mean by that? Do they mean that if three persons agree together not to perform a contract that that is a criminal offence? I ask the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland and the hon. and learned Attorney General for England to answer that question. No doubt the Judges, as Mr. Wright points out in his book, held that an agreement to break a contract was a criminal offence. That, however, was universally recognized to be wrong; and of the great objects of the Act of 1875 was to make it clear that no agreement, or combination to break a contract, was a criminal offence. I take it that the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland will not deny for a moment that, under that Act, a combination not to keep a contract is not made an offence in the Criminal Law, and yet it seems that that is intended by the present Bill. It is a subject of which, I think, we ought to have a clear indication from the Government as to their view of the matter. We ought to be told by them do they, or do they not, hold that, apart from intimidation, an agreement to break a contract is a criminal offence. If that is so, it militates against the fundamental principle of law, which is this—that the Criminal Law is not to be brought in in aid of the enforcement of a civil contract. If it be true that a combination to break a contract is a criminal offence, then the person who enters into a marriage contract, and who is induced by his friends to break it off, instead of being liable in damages, may be liable to a criminal indictment for a conspiracy to break a contract. I ask the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland whether, in order to enforce a contract of marriage, he proposes that it may be possible to indict persons for conspiracy to break that contract. I only wish to know where we stand, and what the view of the Government is upon that question. No doubt, in the old days the language of the Courts was extremely loose; and there is great danger here, because the Government are going, for the first time, to entrust the dealing with this question of conspiracy to the Resident Magistrates—men who are not necessarily learned in the principles of the law, and who may have a disposition to strain those principles of the law. If a man chooses to strain the law of conspiracy, there is nothing that he cannot do, and no person whom he cannot bring within the meshes of the law. In the case of Eccles, decided in 1783, it was laid down by Lord Mansfield that the illegal combination was the gist of the offence, so that if a person in possession of any article of trade may combine to sell it at a certain price, or not to sell it under a certain price, every person who combined in a strike of that kind could be indicted for conspiracy. That is the Common Law doctrine in regard to conspiracy—namely, that if three tradesmen or merchants agree together not to sell an article under a certain price, they are guilty of conspiracy. I see that the Attorney General for England smiles at that, but I will tell him that that was the doctrine which we found it necessary to legislate against in the Trades Unions Act. That is the Common Law doctrine of conspiracy; and, therefore, if any tradesman combines with another set of tradesmen to obtain a certain price for certain articles, he is guilty of a criminal offence; and every labourer who combines in a strike subjects himself to an indictment. During a great part of the present century men have been frequently sent to prison for such combinations without having resorted to any intimidation at all. Parliament felt the extreme danger and injustice of such a state of the law, and in the Bill which was brought in by Sir Richard Cross they overruled that doctrine, and gave the people security against it. I had the honour of taking part, with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James), in the discussions which resulted in that Bill being brought in. The question which I have now to ask the Government is this—Will you give to the tenants of Ireland the same protection which Parliament has given to the labourers of England by the Trades Unions Act? Apart from intimidation under the Trades Unions Act a combination is lawful, and cannot be dealt with as a criminal offence by any Judge or any magistrate in England. Do you propose to make the law in Ireland the same as in England, and, if not, will you give some reason for not doing so? In England the feeling of the Judges was—and no doubt they were perfectly honest in expressing that feeling—that combinations of this kind were unlawful, but all that was altered by the Trades Unions Act of 1875. Will the Government place the Irish tenants in the same position with reference to their combinations? Will they declare that every combination of the tenants of Ireland with reference to the tenure of land, so far as it may affect the interest of the landlord class, is lawful, and ought not to be dealt with as an offence? If the Government will not do that, they must give some reason for their refusal. I ask no more than that the Government shall make it perfectly clear, beyond any possibility of contradiction, that the right of combination of tenants in Ireland with respect to land, which is their industry, shall be placed upon exactly the same footing as the combination of labourers in England with regard to their wages.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am extremely reluctant to interfere with the argument of the right hon. Gentleman; but I must point out that the whole of his argument, so far, has been directed towards an Amendment to the first sub-section of Clause 2, and is not strictly relevant here. The argument here ought to be of this character—although certain transactions may be made punishable, they ought not to be examinable. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman is that they ought not to be punishable, and that contention should be raised on the first sub-section of Clause 2. I do not know whether it is convenient to the Committee that the discussion should proceed now. Although it may be irregular, that may no doubt be done by an understanding being come to by the Committee.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I recognize the pertinence of the observations that have fallen from the Chair. I commenced my argument by saying how difficult I should find it to separate the two cases, because I felt how closely interlaced they are one with the other. It is extremely difficult to discuss them separately, because it is necessary to consider how this power of inquiry into a particular matter really involves the matter itself.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say on behalf of his Friends that they mean to take the discussion now, and not on Clause 2? ["No, no!"]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: No; I do not say that. The discussion on Clause 2 will be taken when that clause is reached. It is impossible for me to give a pledge of that kind. One of the arguments used for applying this Bill against combinations is that they fear the character of coercion. Well, but what do you mean by coercion? Every strike is a coercion, in its very nature. As Mr. Wright says—"The very meaning of a strike is a combination to cause a master or workman to act in his business or employment in a manner in which he does not wish to act, i.e., to coerce him." Therefore every strike is coercion; every combination is coercion. Every combination is, of course, an injury to the person against whom it is meant. If a dozen men say they will not work at less wages than a particular figure, that is an injury to the employer who, if he could take each man separately, might get his work performed at a lower rate. Therefore all these combinations are of the nature of coercion, and are to be put down per fas et nefas. It depends upon the heinousness of the offence whether we are to put it down by extraordinary methods. This is an extraordinary method. Nobody doubts that. The question is to what offences is the remedy to be applied, and I say that it is not to be applied to offences of this character, and if the Government endeavour to justify its application to a combination of this kind, because they say it partakes of the character of coercion, then I say that that is an argument which will apply equally to a strike, because a strike is necessary in the character of coercion. Therefore I say that you ought not to apply limits of this kind merely for the purpose of maintaining civil contracts. You are not to do it by imposing this form of punishment, and here I will point out that this is a preliminary question to the question of punishment. It is not as if there were proof that anybody had committed an offence that a magistrate might surmise that there had been a combination of which there was no evidence, except what he was going to obtain by the mere force of this examination. There is nothing until the examination commences in the shape of a corpus delicti at all. The magistrate may get hold of all kinds of persons, and may inquire into their habits of life and all their business transactions in order, if possible, to discover a combination which, when he has discovered it, he might convert it into a crime. That is the real operation of this clause. I do not charge the Government with intending it, but I point out that this is what may happen, and what I ask from them is a distinct disclaimer, and a Parliamentary security that this shall not be the result of the present legislation. The question which I want particularly to ask is this. If there were a Land Trades Union—I will give it that name—if there were a land Trades Union in Ireland in every respect upon the lines and the principles and the details of a labour Trades Union in England, and if it were applied to the tenure of land in Ireland, do the Government intend to apply this private inquiry to such Trades Unions? If you do, tell me why you draw a distinction between a land Trades Union and a labour Trades Union. I put this hypothesis that the tenants of Ireland may constitute themselves a Trades Union, and call themselves a Land League or a National League or anything else; but, as a matter of fact, they are only a land Trades Union, and if they proceed by combination among themselves to deal with the tenure of land in particular districts, or even throughout the whole of Ireland just as Trades Unions do in England, do you mean to apply this investigation to such Trades Unions in the hope of discovering in their transactions something which may make their combination criminal? That is the definite question which we ought to consider. It would appear that it is absolutely necessary that combinations of this kind should be entered into. We have before us the fact, that last February rents which had been imposed of £7,550 a-year, had been fixed by the Land Court at £5,664, showing a reduction of more than 30 per cent. More than that, there are a great number of tenants who cannot go into the Court now because their rent has been adjudicated upon; therefore they are unable to defend themselves. They can only defend themselves by means of combination. Combination is their only defence, and the question is—How are you going to deal with those combinations? Are you going to root them out by the help of these private inquiries under Clause 1? Are you going to set to work under that clause by putting every man under examination to see whether he is in a combination or whether he intends to join one, because the words of the clause are—

Is a person who advises a combination in reference to the land, presumably examinable in a private inquiry under Section 1? I remember that when my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) and myself were working together in regard to the law of Trades Unions in England, my right hon. and learned Friend said the complaint of the working man was that the law of conspiracy pressed with peculiar irritation, by reason of its uncertainty. He said that that was the law laid down by the Judges, and he maintained that in punishing what the law called conspiracy we were punishing what the working man called combination. Apply that sentence to this case, and apply it to Section 2 of the Bill—that in punishing what the Act calls conspiracy, we are punishing what the tenants in Ireland call combination. My right hon. and learned Friend added these words—

Sir William Harcourt

Is not that true of the present situation? Let us know whether this Bill is directed against combination. Let us know how far it is to go against combination, and if you strip it of the element of intimidation, do you mean to act against it preliminarily by the private inquiry and subsequently by imprisonment? I have said all that I need say in respect to the land; but the section goes much further. It deals with persons working for, or hiring any persons in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation. Consequently you may inquire into the reason why any man does not deal with a particular tradesman. The magistrate may send for him and say—"Why don't you deal with so-and-so." Why am I to answer such a question—a question which may be put to me, in order to extract from the answer some proof that I may have combined with other people not to deal with a particular individual? I very much doubt whether, if you invoke the old Common Law doctrine, you can establish that that is a conspiracy. Are you to proceed against half-a-dozen people who say they will not deal with a certain publican because they object to the character of his house. Is a combination of that kind a conspiracy? Or take the case of an ordinary grocer. I only want to ascertain what the doctrine is which the Government hold on the subject, and how they are going to deal with it. The words of the clause are "hiring any person or persons in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation." Surely that would strike everybody who comes within the definition of the Trades Unions Act? The Bill recapitulates the old law before the Trades Unions Act was passed, and converts these acts into a conspiracy. In fact, the Bill is a frightful extension of the Criminal Law, and it gives a frightful extension to the inquisitorial preliminary inquiry, because even if you admit that the combination itself is punishable, you are not going to apply this inquiry to people who have been proved guilty of combination, but to order an inquiry in order to ascertain whether there has been a combination or not. I want to know who, under such an Act, would be safe? The Attorney General for Ireland himself might be had up and asked as to his dealings with others, who he works for, and by whom he is paid? All these investigations may be applied to one man as well as another, and rigidly applied, would make social life intolerable. These are things which I maintain you ought to leave to the Civil Law. I know that it is said the essence of the offence lies in the combination; but if there is a thing which it is lawful for one man to do, why should it not be lawful for two men, or three, or any number of men to do the same thing together, unless they use intimidation, which the law very wisely provided for in the Act of 1875? I sincerely hope that we are not going to introduce, for the first time, a doctrine of conspiracy, which, as far as the action of Parliament is concerned, has never been introduced before, and which in itself is unfair and unjust. I am sorry to say that recently the Irish Judges, in regard to the doctrine of conspiracy, have gone far beyond what has ever been held before even in the most extreme cases. That is a fact which ought to make us still more careful. We found it necessary in England to legislate against the doctrine laid down by such an eminent Judge as the present Master of the Rolls—Lord Esher—then Mr. Justice Brett—in the case of the gas stokers. There would be infinite danger in leaving the matter loose and at large in Ireland, especially in the present social condition of Ireland. I strongly protest against the inquisitorial power conferred upon the Resident Magistrates under this clause of the Bill. You may justify it, as it was justified in 1882, if you have the same justification—namely, that there is a dangerous prevalence of secret societies in Ireland, as was mentioned in the Preamble of the Act of 1882. I will admit, for the sake of argument, that you may use this power as it was proposed to be used in the Act of 1882 in regard to what is ordinarily understood by the word crime, but not for the purpose of dealing with combinations which, in my opinion, are perfectly legitimate. There is now only one other point to which I wish to refer—the question of public meetings. I hope, when we come to the clause of the Bill dealing with that question, we shall press the Government. If they want to make use of the White-boy Acts, they ought to put into the Bill an abstract of the clauses of those Acts which they desire to incorporate with the Bill. In criminal legislation it is especially necessary to be precise, and it would be easy to condense into a short clause such provisions of the Whiteboy Acts as the Government mean to use. They have given a number of fragmentary clauses of which it is extremely difficult to make head or tail. This, at least, is clear—that by virtue of those Acts and the Bill, if any persons assemble by day or night to the “terror of Her Majesty’s subjects,” by the decision of the magistrate it is an offence. It is quite true that the Act says “to the terror of Her Majesty’s subjects,” and that no persons ought to meet to the terror of Her Majesty’s subjects. Who is to define what constituted such terror? What do the Government mean? I will tell you what a Tory Government of former days decided in the case of the Peterloo riots. Those riots arose out of the meetings called for the reform of Parliament. The military fired on the mob, and the question arose whether the meeting was an illegal one. Two great legal authorities—Lord Eldon and Lord Redesdale—gave their opinion in favour of the Government—that it was an illegal meeting. We shall find here what was then held to be an illegal meeting “to the terror of Her Majesty’s subjects.” Lord Eldon said that when he read the law books he found that numbers constituted force, force terror, and terror illegality; and, under those circumstances, he said he could not deny that the Manchester meeting was an illegal meeting. Look at the process of reasoning; numbers constitute force, force terror, and terror illegality; and, therefore, that meeting, without having been proclaimed, was illegal. Consequently, a numerous meeting is necessarily a terror to Her Majesty’s subjects. I will ask the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland if he accepts that as the doctrine in reference to illegal meetings in Ireland? Lord Redesdale went even further. He said that every meeting for Radical reform was not only a seditious attempt to undermine the existing Constitutional Government by bringing it into hatred and contempt, but was an overt act of treasonable conspiracy against that Constitutional Government, which the King, as its head, was bound by his Coronation Oath to maintain. Therefore, as a meeting that is numerous is an illegal meeting according to Lord Eldon, a meeting for reform is a treasonable conspiracy according to Lord Redesdale. There is nothing to prevent a Resident Magistrate from holding the same doctrines as Lord Eldon and Lord Redesdale; therefore, if a meeting is numerous, the numbers inspire terror, and a meeting in favour of Home Rule is, of course, a treasonable conspiracy. I want to know if these doctrines are to be left to the Resident Magistrates to determine so far as the application of the Whiteboy Acts is concerned. Not merely anybody who goes to a meeting, but anyone who gives notice of a meeting or publishes it, or even has it in contemplation to do so, may be secretly interrogated by a magistrate, and if the magistrate does not approve the objects of the meeting, it may be forbidden, and even imprisonment may be inflicted. But there is a much more serious power which comes up under Clauses 6 and 7. Clause 6 provides that—“If the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied that any association formed for the commission of crimes, or carrying on operations by the commission of crimes, or encouraging or aiding persons to commit crimes, or promoting or inciting to acts of violence or intimidation, or interfering with the administration of the law, or disturbing the maintenance of law and order,” he shall have power to proclaim it. That sounds all right, but if hon. Members will look at the bottom of the clause they will find that the expression “crime” means any offence punishable under the Act. Therefore, it is not even the Resident Magistrate, but if the Lord Lieutenant is of opinion that any association is a criminal conspiracy under the section, or a combination of which he does not approve, he may without any judicial decision, or even the form of application to a Resident Magistrate, by his mere ipse dixit, make it criminal, and everybody who has had anything to do with it may be sent to prison summarily on his declaration. Any half-dozen people selected by the Lord Lieutenant may be declared to be an association of this character. By Clause 7 the term “association” is made to include any combination of persons, whether the same be known by any distinctive name or not. Therefore, any combination in reference to land proposing to hold a meeting will be at the mercy of the Lord Lieutenant, who may deal with it without any preliminary inquiry whatever, or any legal discussion. It is converted into an illegal meeting ipso facto, and all persons belonging to it may be sent to prison. At this early stage, I think we have a right to know to what purposes the Government mean to apply these clauses, and whether or not they really intend to do that which appears, on the face of the words of the Bill, to be the purpose of it. I hope, and fully expect, to receive a disclaimer from the Government that they intend to do anything of the kind. If they have no such intention, I trust they will accept my Amendment, so as to prevent the possibility of the Bill being applied to such purposes.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at end, add—"Provided that no examination under this section shall be held in respect of any matters relating to public meetings, or transaction relating to the letting, hiring, or occupation of land, or the dealing with, working for, or hiring of any persons in the ordinary course of trade, business or occupation."—(Sir William Harcourt.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I must protest, although in no hostile or controversial spirit, against the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman, who has delivered a long, elaborate, and able speech, but a speech which would certainly have been more appropriate at a later part of the Bill. I have no doubt the same arguments would be repeated hereafter, either by the right hon. Gentleman himself or some of those who sit near him, with not less detail or elaboration. The result will probably be that what might have been dismissed at one sitting will now be extended over two or three. If the arguments which the right hon. Gentleman has addressed to the Committee are of such a kind as to convince the Committee that the offences dealt with in the later clauses ought not to be included in the Bill, then ipso facto, by the very action of the Committee, they will cease to be the subjects of a private inquiry under this section. Therefore, it would have been more for the convenience of the Committee that the discussion should be taken upon the question whether certain offences are to be punished summarily or not, and act upon the subsidiary question whether there should be a private inquiry into them.

I have said that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was very long and elaborate. There was, however, one remarkable omission in it, and that was that he never once alluded to his own Amendment. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman is responsible for the drafting of the Amendment. It seems to me that it is couched in terms so vague, so wide, and obscure that I have not been able, even with legal assistance, to find out what its operation really would be. Look at the wording of the Amendment. It says—

"No examination under this section shall be held in respect of any matters relating to public meetings."

As I understand, the result would be that if a murder happened to be committed at a public meeting no examination should take place into any of the circumstances connected with it under the first section. Then the Amendment goes on to say, that no inquiry shall be held into any "transaction relating to the letting, hiring, or occupation of land, or the dealing with, working for, or hiring of any persons in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation."

That seems to me to exclude all agrarian offences whatever. Take the case of the murdered man Murphy as an example. I do not suppose that that is the object of the right hon. Gentleman, but it is the effect of the clause. The murder of the man Murphy undoubtedly was connected with the letting, or hiring, or occupation of land. If the clause were adopted textually it would certainly preclude examination into cases like that of the murder of Murphy. I do not think it necessary to spend a longer time over this Amendment, considering that the right hon. Gentleman never referred to it once in the course of his speech. Therefore, in the few remarks I propose to make, I shall confine myself to the remarks the right hon. Gentleman has made to the Committee. But the right hon. Gentleman asked two or three categorical questions with regard to the interpretation we put upon the clause and the combinations we wish to punish under it. I am not going to follow the right hon. Gentleman into his learned disquisition upon the law of conspiracy. The conspiracy the Government mean to punish under this Bill, and mean to inquire into under this clause, is sufficiently defined either in the body of the Bill itself or by the Amendments the Government have put upon the Paper. The Government have made it, I hope, perfectly clear that, while they make no attempt, and mean to make no attempt, to modify the law of conspiracy, they mean to confine the operation of the Bill strictly to conspiracies which, by the law as it at present stands, are criminal and indictable conspiracies. We consider that to be a sufficient limitation. Then, says the right hon. Gentleman, it was found necessary in 1875 to alter the law of criminal conspiracy with regard to workmen, and ought we not to extend to the tenants of Ireland, if they combine with regard to rent, the same protection which is extended to the workmen of England when they combine in trade disputes and in the matter of wages? The right hon. Gentleman must be perfectly aware that the law of conspiracy as it regards wages has a special history of its own entirely distinct from the law of conspiracy as regards such matters as the letting and hiring of land. Every lawyer in the House will be perfectly aware that according to the doctrine universally prevalent in this country a number of years ago, it was a grave public danger that there should be any combination at all with regard to the rates of wages. The Courts of Law and statesmen looked in the most jealous manner upon any attempt on the part of workmen to deal with these matters; and, therefore, it was that as the Common Law relating to criminal conspiracy was regarded as extremely harsh, onerous, and unjust, it did well to limit and alter it in 1875. But there has never been any similar application of the law of conspiracy in the matter of the letting and hiring of land. The right hon. Gentleman has allowed his imagination to wander at large and to conceive all manner of cases in which the tenants might combine to alter rent. He has invented cases of conspiracy which no lawyer would admit to be cases of criminal conspiracy under the existing law. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the case of three tenants agreeing together to try to induce a landlord to let land to them at 15s. instead of £1 per acre. He said that under the existing law that would be a criminal and indictable conspiracy, and that therefore it would be punishable summarily under the Bill we have drafted. It would be nothing of the kind. It would not be criminal conspiracy, and it would not be indictable conspiracy, nor would any Judge ever decide that it was. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the law of conspiracy is an obscure law. It is said that it is a difficult law, which is capable of dangerous extension, and that we are leaving its administration to men who are not learned in the law—namely, the Resident Magistrates. But the right hon. Gentleman forgot to say that the Resident Magistrate's decision is not final.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): He may give two months' imprisonment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not complain of the interruption. The hon. and learned Member is quite correct in saying, that under the Bill, as we have drafted it, we may have followed too closely the Act of 1882, and that by the existing law of Ireland there is no appeal if the imprisonment is for less than a month. But we propose to give an appeal in every case.

MR. T. M. HEALY: With no accumulative sentences?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There will be an appeal in every case to a County Court Judge, and if, on legal technicalities, the County Court Judge is objected to, the Government will be prepared to consider a plan for giving an appeal in cases in which a legal difficulty may be involved to a still higher tribunal. Therefore, no weight is to be attached to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, that those who will have to administer the law in the first instance will not be trained and competent lawyers. The right hon. Gentleman says—"Restrict the Bill to those offences against which it is popularly supposed to be directed, and we will allow you to pass it." He says that it is popularly supposed to be directed against crime. The special offence which the right hon. Gentleman desires to exclude by that limitation is, as I understand, the offence of Boycotting.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. What I said was combinations in which there was no intimidation.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not going on this stage of the Bill to enter into a definition of the word "Boycotting;" but if the right hon. Gentleman supposes, for one moment, that the people of this country imagine that this Bill is not directed, among other things, against the offence of conspiracy to Boycott, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that he is very much mistaken. I believe there is nothing going on in Ireland at this moment which causes more universal horror and disgust in this country than this widespread practice of Boycotting. [An hon. MEMBER: And the operations of the Primrose League.] I should not think the Bill worth going on with if the Committee were to compel us to exclude from its operation the offence of conspiracy to Boycott. To return for a moment to the clause under discussion, which the right hon. Gentleman left so very wide. We are of opinion that every offence which is worth punishing under the Bill is an offence worth inquiring into under this clause. To that broad principle we mean to adhere. It will rest with the Committee to decide what the offences should be; but decision must be made, not upon this clause, but upon the later clauses of the Bill. I will conclude by saying, that although the right hon. Gentleman holds out to us the hope that if we are ready to make the large concession that is asked for, and which, it is understood, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) supports, and which the right hon. Gentleman indicated in a speech recently delivered, we shall get rid of our principal difficulty in passing the Bill, all I have to say is, that the Government are distinctly of opinion that that which they are not prepared to yield to argument they are not prepared to yield to Obstruction.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): In my opinion, this is one of the most important Amendments which have yet been moved. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, just before he sat down, remarked that any offence which is worth prosecuting under this measure is worth inquiring into under this clause. Now, Sir, that leads me to ask this question—What is the object of the clause at all? What is the justification the Government put forward for retaining it? There is no question here of the failure of juries. The clause has nothing to say to juries, whether juries do their duty or not. The ground upon which the clause is justified is simply the difficulty which is alleged to exist in Ireland of obtaining evidence, and of bringing offenders to justice, or rather of making them amenable—to use a technical expression contained in the clause. I think it will be admitted by every Member of the Committee that we should closely watch a Bill of this kind, and that we should put no power into the hands of the Executive, in regard to a necessity for which they have not made out a strong and complete case. Let me admit, for the sake of argument, that there are cases in which there is a difficulty of obtaining evidence, and a difficulty in making a person amenable for the offence he may have committed. Can anyone say that that applies to offences in the nature of combination—combination such as I have myself been engaged in? In such combinations there is not the smallest difficulty in obtaining evidence, or in making persons amenable. Look at what occurred in Ireland during the last winter. Combinations which we desire to exempt from these preliminary inquiries were well known to exist in the country, and that the Government desired to make us amenable to the law. Had they the smallest scrap of difficulty in obtaining evidence, evidence as to all our proceedings, and in making us amenable to justice? Nothing of the sort, and the Judges who tried the case stated that that there was not only evidence, but a superabundance of evidence as to the whole nature of the conspiracy in which we had entered. It was the jury who failed to see that there was any evidence of conspiracy at all. Therefore, in combinations of this character, there is no difficulty in getting all the evidence you desire to have; no difficulty whatever in bringing that evidence before the jury; no difficulty in making people amenable; but the difficulty consists in convicting the prisoner. Therefore, I say, with regard to these combinations, leaving out of the question transactions connected with public meetings, there is not a shadow of excuse for including them in this preliminary inquiry, even if a case should be made out for punishment under the Bill. Therefore, I think I have given an unanswerable reply to the contention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who said that, in the opinion of the Government, any offence that is worth punishing under this Bill is worth inquiring into under this section. I think I have shown that the offences which the Government consider to be worthy of punishment under this Bill are plain and manifest offences, and that there is no necessity for inquiring into them under this section, inasmuch as they are done in the open light of day with abundant evidence of what has been done. That is one strong reason which induces me not to accept the clause of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in the opening portion of his speech, criticized the drafting of the Amendment at considerable length. I think that is a very poor way of conducting a debate of this character. The truth is, and this is the real point at issue—if the Government are prepared to grant any concession, the right hon. Gentleman should have pointed out the terms on which the Government are willing to consent to an Amendment which may meet the difficulties we find to exist in this clause. The right hon. Gentleman characterized this as a subsidiary and an unimportant question. Now, I do not think that it is either subsidiary or unimportant. I have held from the very outset, as I hold still, that this clause places in the hands of the Executive powers of the most oppressive character if they choose to abuse them. And the matter largely turns on the question whether the Executive Government of Ireland will abuse these powers, or whether they will not? If the Executive Government intend to abuse the powers conferred upon them in this section, I do not believe it is possible to conceive any more intolerable oppression than may be put in force under the clause. I believe that this is one of the things the Government will do, when they secure the passing of the Bill. Under this section, they will be empowered to make inquiry in any district in Ireland, whether there has been a combination under the Plan of Campaign, or whether a combination against the payment of excessive rents exists. They will be able to summon every man in the district before a secret inquiry who is suspected of holding Nationalist opinions, or of sympathizing with the views of the Nationalists; and if no limit is put to the questions which may be asked, there cannot be the slightest doubt that they can so frame their questions, and still keep them legal, as to enable them, under this clause, and under the pretext of inquiry, to enter into matters with regard to which there is not the smallest necessity for inquiring into, because they will be matters of public notoriety, and they will then be able to imprison every man who is considered by the Government to be an obnoxious and a dangerous character in a particular district. We have seen persons sent to prison in open day for refusing to answer questions put to them with a political bias; and powers of this kind will be used to imprison and remove persons who are obnoxious and troublesome to the Government. We are not concerned, in opposing the power of the Government, to inquire into Moonlighting offences and other offences of that nature; but what we are afraid of is that they will be required by the pressure of their supporters in Ireland to carry out an investigation in connection with the estates of every landlord in Ireland who is undergoing the Plan of Campaign, or who is in fear of the Plan of Campaign. Any landlord, whose tenants do not pay their rents satisfactorily, will swear that there exists a combination on his estate, and that that combination has been brought about with the intention of lowering rents. An investigation will then be ordered, and when that investigation is ordered, what will be done? The local leaders of the Nationalist Party will be summoned to give evidence. They will not be inclined to give evidence if they are respectable men, and even those who may feel inclined to do so, will not dare to do so, because we know what a man would feel if he were placed under the stigma of being called an informer in Ireland. Therefore, these unfortunate men, no matter how respectable their position, and however free from crime they may be, will be placed in this cruel position—they will be called up before a bogus secret investigation to give evidence as to some alleged conspiracy. They will be asked to give evidence which, in their minds and in the consciences of their fellows around them, bears upon the private concerns of their neighbours. They will refuse to give that information, and they will be thrust into gaol and kept there for a month, or two months, according to the nature of the warrant, without security that when they are released they will not have to undergo the same ordeal again. The Government say that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman will include agrarian crimes. That is not the intention of the Amendment, whatever its words may be. The intention is that this system of oppression—and I am confident that it will be in full swing in the course of a month or two after the Act has passed—shall not be possible. They say that we must trust in a matter of this kind to the Government that the Act shall not be abused. Now, I am not inclined to trust to any Government, either Liberal or Conservative; but I agree with Sir George Trevelyan that, from the very nature of the case, we are bound to distrust a Tory more than a Liberal Government, because in Ireland a Tory Government will consist of the landlords and their agents and supporters. Therefore they will be bound to strain the powers conferred on them in the interest of the only supporters they have in Ireland. With this foreknowledge, we are entitled to assume that the clause will be strained, and that the most oppressive use will be made of it against the tenants and in favour of the landlords. The Government say that they want to inquire into conspiracies, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland gives us an assurance that they have put certain Amendments in the Bill which will prevent anything being treated as a criminal conspiracy under the Act, which was not an indictable offence before the Act passed. That is a very comforting assurance, or, at any rate, it may be to the Government; but we who have gone through the mill in Ireland, and have had some experience in matters of this kind, know very well what amount of protection it will afford us. Lord Fitzgerald has laid down what the Law of Conspiracy is in the case of the "Queen v. Parnell." Lord Fitzgerald's judgment in laying down the Law of Conspiracy as far as Ireland is concerned, and I suppose it is the same in England, is now quoted by all Judges of any authority in Ireland. He has declared, in the clearest and most unmistakable language, that a combination of tenants in Ireland formed for the purpose of lowering rents, or for holding rents, is a criminal conspiracy in Common Law, and an indictable offence. He used these words—

"For a single tenant to withhold his rent and break his contract with a view of coercing his landlord to lower the rent is no offence at all; but for two or three tenants to agree together for the same purpose and for the same object is an indictable offence in the Criminal Law."

Then what comfort is it to be told by the Government that they are not going to use this law in order to secure a conviction for a conspiracy which is not an offence against the Criminal Law already? Let me take my own case. I have never been out of a criminal conspiracy since the year 1879. The Judges in Ireland clearly laid that down on the two occasions on which I stood my trial. Then, how was it I escaped, seeing that I had broken the law? Why, everybody knew that I had done so. I have spent all my life advising the tenants of Ireland not to do certain things, and the reason I escaped was that the Government were not able to get a jury in Ireland to agree to find me a criminal under the Common Law. If the Irish people had the power, they would give the same protection to the tenant farmers of Ireland as is now enjoyed by the labouring men of England, and the Law of Conspiracy would be checked by Statute. This Bill is a Bill to deprive us of the protection of juries, and for the Chief Secretary for Ireland to say that nothing will be held a conspiracy or an indictable offence except what is now a conspiracy in Common Law, is really a most contemptible way of dealing with the matter. Supposing an investigation is ordered in Ireland in regard to some particular estate, in regard to which there has been trouble. Take, for instance, Mr. Shirley's estate in Monaghan. If the provisions of this Bill were enforced, Mr. Shirley's agent is the man who would swear the information upon which the secret investigation would be ordered, and every single individual who has taken a leading part in encouraging the tenants would be directed to give evidence, and would probably be put in gaol. The confederacies of tenants are not the only confederacies which exist in Ireland. We have, also, in Ireland a great number of landlord confederacies, and I fail to see why it should be held to be criminal and punishable by law, and why investigations are to be conducted into confederacies to lower the rent, when it is admitted on all hands that the rent is too high, while the confederacies of landlords, who conduct their operations much more secretly than we do, and who do not publish their proceedings in the newspapers, are to be allowed to continue unchecked. If the Chief Secretary for Ireland institutes proceedings against our combinations in Ireland, will he order investigations into similar combinations on the part of landlord confederacies and emergency men, with the view of meting out the same justice to them? [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I will.] I understand the Chief Secretary to say that he will deal out the same justice to the landlords as to the tenants; but I will tell him that, strong a man as he is, he dare not, and he will not do it, because, if he attempted to do it, he would be hunted out of Ireland by the Irish landlords. The right hon. Gentleman does not know Ireland well enough yet to be aware how any interference with the projects of the Irish landlords would raise a hornet's nest about his ears. Notwithstanding the promise which the Chief Secretary is inclined to give, I know that these inquiries into confederacies will be entirely one-sided, and that while the combinations of the tenants will be put down, those of the landlords will be left absolutely free. The Chief Secretary for Ireland has not attempted to give a solitary reason why he objects to make this exemption under the clause. I have shown that there is no necessity whatever for including these things. If these combinations are punishable and ought to be put down, there is no necessity for this preliminary investigation. The combinations are openly conducted, and those who are concerned in them can always be got at. I have shown, I think, that the Bill will place a power in the hands of the Executive which will be unfairly used. Our past experience affords us no security that a power of this kind will not be unfairly used, and I ask the Government to state a reason why they should not except combinations, where no crime is shown to exist, from an inquiry which even they themselves must confess to be uncalled-for and useless. The adoption of the Amendment will do no harm to their Bill, and it ought to be enough for the Government to know that it will be regarded as a concession by us.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): We are asked why we should not do as much for the tenants of Ireland as we have already done for the working men of England, and the whole of the elaborate argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) was based upon the analogy between the Plan of Campaign and the strikes of artisans in this country. Now, that analogy is not only insulting to the artisans of this country, but it is hopelessly illogical. May I be permitted to point out to the Committee that, in order to make that analogy even approximately applicable, one would have to imagine mill hands holding a mill during the progress of a strike, or miners taking forcible possession of a mine. The analogy between the Plan of Campaign and the combination of working men in England is destroyed by the one fact never mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman opposite—that the English artisans strike with their own labour, whereas the Irish tenants strike with their landlord's land. That omission seems to me to be altogether destructive of the elaborate argument of the right hon. Gentleman, which was entirely one of analogy, and we know that false analogy is the fruitful parent of error. I must say that I think it is very much to be regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland should have dealt, what seems to me, to be a very serious blow at the Resident Magistrates of Ireland. If there is in future to be an appeal from the decisions of the Resident Magistrates to the County Court Judges, it does not require very much prescience to foresee that this Bill will produce a plentiful crop of them. If the Resident Magistrates are not fit to administer the law which this Parliament makes the sooner they cease to be Resident Magistrates the better.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: May I remind the hon. Member that there is a power of appeal now in the case of any conviction for crime in any part of Ireland.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I do not intend to give force to the conviction expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that all persons associated with my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby intend to dwell at great length on this question. I confess that I waited for a moment after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because I entertained the hope that some further elucidation of the matter would be given, and that there would be some further prospect of satisfying those who earnestly desired to see some simplification of the question and some light thrown upon the obscure objects and purposes of the Bill; but as no other Member of the Government has risen for that purpose, I feel it my duty to say a few words in order to point out in what manner the Chief Secretary for Ireland has left the question. The right hon. Gentleman, as I understood him, began by complaining that the Amendment is not legitimate because it is avowed to have reference to a subject-matter, which subject-matter has not yet been adopted, and which is an abstract principle which may be excluded from the Bill—that is to say, that my right hon. Friend proposes to exclude from the operation of this clause certain provisions which are now included in the 2nd clause, which provisions, the right hon. Gentleman says, may drop out of the clause, and, in that case, they would of themselves drop out of this clause also, and, consequently, this Amendment is illegitimate. That is a very ingenious mode of putting the question from one point of view; but there is another mode of putting it. Supposing that these provisions do not drop out of the 2nd clause, what becomes of the right hon. Gentleman's argument? The question for us to consider is, whether it is likely that these provisions will drop out of the second clause? Are not the forces of the Government on that side of the House and on this mustered for the purpose of keeping them in, and, if so, what chance has my right hon. Friend of excluding them? We must get at the rational principle, and the rational principle is—especially after the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland—that they will not be excluded from the 2nd clause; and, therefore, this is really the proper time to endeavour to exclude them from the 1st clause, having regard to the distinction drawn by you, Sir, that if they are inquirable they shall not be examinable. Some of the points which were made by my right hon. Friend have been entirely passed over by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. There were two points put by my right hon. Friend with great force and great clearness. My right hon. Friend stated—"Suppose the case of a Land Trades Union formed in Ireland. Will you extend to that Land Trades Union the same, and only the same, protection as that which you have given by the Act of 1875 to the Labour Trades Union of England?" I am sorry to say that on this subject the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was too distinct; but I am glad that the question has been so plainly put, because it is well that the matter should be plainly understood, and, by degrees, it will be understood by the country. Ireland, under the present constitution of things, is to have the benefit of equal legislation. The argument of my right hon. Friend is that land is the subject of Irish labour, just as the question of wages is the matter that determines generally the character and capacity of the English Law; and we want to know whether they are to have the same protection? The Irish Minister tells us distinctly—"No, they are not to have the same protection." He refuses to give to Irish labour employed on the land the same protection as is enjoyed by English labour given in return for wages. What is the reason the right hon. Gentleman alleges for this unfavourable answer, and for this decided refusal? It is that the law with respect to wages has been illegitimately aggravated as against the working man, but that there has been no such aggravation of the law with respect to land in Ireland. That contention was distinctly met by my right hon. Friend with the assertion that the fact stated is entirely erroneous. I believe that we, and others who are better acquainted than I am with the law, are of opinion that the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon), who has just sat down, has correctly and accurately stated the doctrine of conspiracy affecting the taking of land laid down by the Irish Judges. Now, Sir, what is the protection given to English labour under the Trades Unions Act which ought not to be given to Irish labour? Let that be stated, and let that be understood, because, on the face of it, the present state of the case is clearly this, that there is to be a protection we get from the Government a clear account of what it is that constitutes the special necessity for protecting labour in England that does not exist in Ireland. The vital point is whether their intention is to punish combination which leads to or includes intimidation or combination which does not, and which, however little desirable it may be in itself, however characteristic it may be of a defective state of society, yet is the only weapon by means of which the poor, humbler classes of the people of Ireland can defend themselves against the risk of oppression.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WESTER) (Isle of Wight): Mr. Courtney, I am unwilling to stand between the Committee and the Division. Upon the other hand, I have not the slightest wish to avoid answering the direct appeal made to me by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt). I have certainly not in the least desired, and I am certain no other Member of the Government has desired, that there shall be the slightest doubt as to what our intentions are, and as to the meaning of this Bill. We have alleged over and over again that this Bill is directed against crime, and we draw no distinction between crime and offences. It is with that object that the clauses of this Bill have been framed, and we ask anyone to point out language or words in the different sections which are capable of any meaning but that. Now, Sir, we have heard a very interesting argument from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby on the Law of Conspiracy, and part of that argument has been repeated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and who has, also, asked us, are you prepared to refuse to the tenants of Ireland the same protection that you give to the labourers of England? Sir, of course we are not prepared to refuse to persons in Ireland, in the same position as the labourers of England, exactly the same protection we give to the labourers in England; but those who study the law, and those who do understand the question, as I am sure the right hon. Gentleman does, cannot seriously mean that there is any real parallel between the state of circumstances which led to the passing of the Trades Unions Act and the circumstances which affect the rights between landlords and tenants. In the first place, we have that significant distinction to which attention was called by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that the law, as between masters and servants, had developed into such a condition of things that it called for remedy, and called for remedy because criminal proceedings were taken in respect to matters which ought to be the foundation of civil remedy, and that it was because there had been a practice, partly founded on ancient Statute, and partly founded on Common Law, of treating matters as between masters and servants as within the purview of the Criminal Law, that it became necessary to interfere in the matter. But will any lawyer in the House suggest that there has ever been a practice or instance of setting in force the Criminal Law as between landlord and tenant. I only hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), or some of his right hon. Friends, will make his meaning clear. It is impossible to question the right of tenants to combine for the purpose of saying—"We will try and induce our landlords, by fair means, to charge a lower rent, or we will agree together that we will leave our farms rather than pay a certain rent." I do not believe that there is any Judge who would pretend that such a combination was unlawful. [Cries of "Yes! over and over again."] I repeat my statement, I do not believe there is a Judge who would allege that in such a case there was a criminal conspiracy. But when the tenants who can pay combine for the purpose of bringing the landlord to his knees, for the purpose of keeping out of the landlord's pocket the money which belongs to him, an entirely different set of circumstances arises. It requires no deep study of the Law of Conspiracy to see the distinction between a combination of a number of men to say—"We are not willing to give more than a certain amount, but we think there should be some fair pressure put on the landlord to make him come to a fair agreement with us," and a combination between people who are in a position to pay, and who would be willing to pay individually were it not that they are induced to abstain from paying because the hope is that thereby the landlord will be deprived of his money, and will be coerced into making an arrangement which will be putting an end to legal bargain. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) will give me his attention for one moment. I have suffered more than once in this House from observations made by the right hon. Gentleman when my mouth was closed, and at a time when, owing to the course of debate, I could not interrupt him, because I do not like interrupting speakers on the other side, and never do it if I can avoid it. When I said that there was a broad distinction between criminal conspiracy and conspiracy, the right hon. Gentleman subjected me to his most caustic criticism. He turned round to hon. Gentlemen behind him, and asked if they had ever heard of criminal murder, of criminal perjury, and said, was it not a ridiculous thing to talk about criminal conspiracy? I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman has since that speech consulted that admirable treatise to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby referred to-night when he referred to an opinion which every English lawyer respects, I mean the opinion of Mr. Wright, well known to hon. Gentlemen who sit opposite as well as to those who sit on these Benches. Does the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian know that that very work, which was quoted so much by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, is a work in reference to the law of criminal conspiracy? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has said that my statement, that there is a distinction between criminal conspiracy and conspiracy, is nonsense, and, therefore, I think I am justified in retorting on the right hon. Gentleman by quoting an authority to which he and his Colleagues have referred, in which pages are devoted to the distinction between criminal conspiracies and other conspiracies. On page 57 of that work, there will be found these words—

“It must be remembered that there is no intrinsic efficacy in the word ‘conspiracy,’ or in the word ‘confederacy,’ or in the word ‘combination.’ ‘Conspire (said Lord Campbell in Hamp’s case, 1852) is nothing; agreement is the thing.’”

It is therefore the criminality of the conspiracy that is important, it is the agreement either to do an unlawful act or to obtain an unlawful end, which constitutes that which is a criminal conspiracy. I assure the right hon. Gentleman I have not made this reference simply for the pleasure of doing so, and I am perfectly willing to submit my argument upon this question to the judgment of the House. We never intended to suggest that when four men meeting together said—“We think we are over-rented, and we will ask for a reduction from next Michaelmas, and unless we get it we will hold this land no longer,” it was an improper combination. I have stated the law both of England and Ireland, and although I am not going to lengthen the debate on this point, I think it necessary to make good my observations with regard to this matter. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian asks the Government for an assurance as to what we mean by our Bill; our answer is that the Bill clearly shows its own meaning. Now the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has asked us to put some words into the Bill which will indicate the class of conspiracy. There could not be a more unwise step; there could not be a more misleading step; there could not be any step, in my opinion, which would be more retrograde in connection with the Criminal Law. It is utterly impossible for any person to define beforehand what may be the actual case which will constitute a criminal conspiracy, and for this reason, as the right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well, that the intent you have at the time you are doing an act may make that which is an innocent act for one purpose a criminal act for another purpose. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has asked if we mean intimidation—if we mean anything else but intimidation? Why, Sir, does the right hon. Gentleman mean to suggest to this Committee that there are not classes of Boycotting which are perfectly well known and understood by every Member of this House, and which you could not very strictly bring within the meaning of the word intimidation? I can imagine cases in which there have been conspiracies for the purpose of libelling individuals.

Sir Richard Webster

[Home Rule cheers.] I have no sympathy with conspiracies to libel individuals; but I may say that it is just because you can imagine some of the direst forms of oppression of this kind brought to bear on peaceable individuals, which do not come within the legal or popular meaning of intimidation, that you do require to have a clause which, while it shall indicate on the face of it the criminality of the act, shall not attempt to define that which is or is not a criminal conspiracy. I think I mentioned this on a previous occasion, but I may be permitted to mention it again, that it is not very many years ago that you could not find the word Boycotting in the dictionary. It arose from that which was undoubtedly a criminal act practised upon Captain Boycott, and here we have got that which many hon. Members admit to be a state of things which ought to be put down. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley), certainly the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), has over and over again said that he protests against Boycotting. We have got, undoubtedly, a state of things which everybody agrees ought to be put down, and yet we are asked to define in this Act what will be Boycotting, perhaps, 10 years hence. Reference has been made to a passage from page 7 of the Report of Lord Cowper's Commission. I am not going to read it again because I have read it at length in the course of the debates on this Bill; but if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian wants to know what we mean by Boycotting, we mean the practice there spoken to in that strong language of condemnation by a Commission which is frequently appealed to by hon. Members below the Gangway. I believe it to be impossible to define what Boycotting may develop itself into in the future. Now, I hope I shall be pardoned for a moment if I refer to the Act of 1882. I never have referred to that Act for the purpose of justifying the conduct of Her Majesty's Government on the present occasion. We justify our conduct on the reasons which we have over and over again explained to the House. But I ask, when you are dealing with a particular remedial proposal, and when you find that that particular remedial proposal has been directed to certain evils two or three years ago, and hon. Gentlemen opposite have changed their minds on the matter, whether we are not surely justified in asking why, if an inquiry clause were considered to be a proper kind of clause to be applied to certain offences in 1882, it is not a proper clause to be applied to the same kind of offences in 1887? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) have referred to intimidation. Does the Committee remember that, according to the Act of 1882, it was considered necessary that you might have a secret inquiry in the case of intimidation by an individual? ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby evidently agrees with me on this point. Now, I want to know if it was a right thing to inquire secretly into intimidation by an individual, which means that you have to have a man up and ask him, were you intimidated by a particular individual, on what logical argument can it be said it is not right to inquire into a conspiracy to intimidate?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have never said that this power should be applied to intimidation; what I said referred to conspiracy, apart from intimidation.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I want to know, if conspiracy to intimidate is to be inquired into, why other kinds of conspiracy are not to be inquired into? Much mischief might be done by slanderous remarks with regard to individuals, and I am utterly at a loss to understand on what grounds it can be suggested that that class of conspiracy is not to be made a subject of inquiry. What we say is this, that if you once get the principle recognized, that it is necessary that you should be able to get at the bottom of societies which are, to a certain extent, I will not say secret in name, but secret in operation, which are by ways and means which are not apparent on the surface interfering with the free action of individuals, who wish to be unmolested, by acting upon, or getting other people to act upon, them in an unlawful or criminal way, we care not what shape it may take, whether it be violence, intimidation, attempts to get people not to deal with them—we say that the vice which lies at the root of this conspiracy and combination is the same, and once you grant there shall be inquiry into one, there ought not to be any halting place in the inquiry into them all. It is unnecessary for me to deal at the present moment at greater length with that matter. I confess I was somewhat surprised that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) should have thought it worth while to unearth what he called the dicta of Tory lawyers in connection with the Peterloo riots, for the purpose of suggesting that Tory or Unionist lawyers of the present day have the same ideas in their minds as the lawyers of that day had. Will he kindly refer to the speech of any public man on this side of the House, or among the Liberal Unionists, who has ever suggested that to such a public meeting as could fairly be described as a harmless meeting, the law in regard to unlawful assemblies should be applied? The right hon. Gentleman would have us believe there is no such thing as an unlawful assembly—that it is a term unknown to the English law, unless the rule which was supposed to be applied in the case of the Peterloo riots was to be the test of what is an unlawful assembly. He would have us believe that the opinion held in regard to the Peterloo riots is to be taken as a test of the opinion which prevails in the minds of some Gentlemen as to unlawful assemblies in the present day. I must say that, if that kind of argument is going to be used in regard to the meaning of unlawful assembly, we are justified in asking hon. Gentlemen opposite what they meant when they said in the year 1882—

“Every person who, in a proclaimed district, takes part in any riot or unlawful assembly, shall be deemed to be guilty of an offence under this Act.”

I say this, if a private inquiry clause was deemed to be a proper kind of clause to apply to unlawful assemblies in the year 1882, will the right hon. Gentleman tell me why a similar clause applied to certain offences should be wrong in 1887? That question I submit to the judgment of the Committee. We have never had one single answer to that, nor have we received from right hon. Gentlemen opposite one single word of argument. I am not going to argue at any greater length as to what is the meaning of Clause 2. I fear that notwithstanding the honest wish of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, that we should discuss the principle of this clause at the present moment, we shall be treated to the same kind of debate that we are now having when we come to that clause. I will say, in conclusion, that the Government are making no change in the law. We are not seeking to re-enact or disinter fossil dicta which have remained buried for years, and which no Judges of modern times have unearthed. We have, on the face of our Bill, stated the conspiracies to which we wish this Bill to apply, and what we wish the procedure of inquiry and the procedure of punishment to be. In the first place, the conspiracy will be criminal, and in order to make that meaning clearer, I have put upon the Paper an Amendment whereby we have said that the conspiracies shall be conspiracies punishable by law at the time of the passing “of this Act.” I do not know that any lawyer who honestly wishes to define the offence and to show what are criminal acts could do more than that. I protest against the suggestion that the Government intend to pick out certain acts of individuals and condemn them as offences for political reasons. I do not apologize for detaining the Committee so long, because I desired to make our meaning clear. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman opposite can say that I have not made my meaning clear. He may not agree with me; but I would ask the Committee not even to adopt the spirit of his Amendment, which we conceive would be most mischievous.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not propose to detain the Committee, but only rise for a moment or two to offer a personal explanation. I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that interruption is often very inconvenient, and I therefore did not interrupt him in the course of his speech. I wish to say that I am totally unaware of the offence with which he charges me. I have never presumed to criticize at all, much less to describe in disrespectful language, any legal opinion given by the hon. and learned Gentleman. It would be extremely wrong in me, and very absurd of me, to do so. I was criticizing the language used by another person not having legal authority.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: The matter arose in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman on the first reading of the Bill, in which he offered most caustic criticism on the use of the words "criminal conspiracy." Thereupon I, interlocutarily, called attention to the words "criminal conspiracy," and the right hon. Gentleman at once replied that the expression was nonsense, and turning to me, said to me across the floor of the House, "Would the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General think of speaking of criminal murder, or of criminal burglary?" [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE made a gesture of dissent.] The right hon. Gentleman will pardon me, what I state is not for the purpose of justifying myself, but for the purpose of showing that there is a solid distinction which the law regards as between "conspiracy" and "criminal conspiracy"—between combinations and criminal combinations.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: We are not discussing the validity of the distinction at this moment. What I wish to say is, that if I used the word "nonsense," it was not in reference to any remarks of the Attorney General. I was making no comment on his proceedings. I disclaim that altogether, and my appeal to the hon. and learned Gentleman was meant to be a testimony of my respect for and of my confidence in any legal opinion he might give.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I accept that explanation unfeignedly.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: If the fault rests upon anyone it rests upon me. I believe I was the person who objected to the use of the words "criminal conspiracy," and my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian was only an accessory after the fact. I objected to the words "criminal conspiracy" in an Act of Parliament, whether we use them in language, or in the title of a book, and I shall be glad if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General will produce any Act of Parliament in which the words "criminal conspiracy" occur. When he has done that, I will withdraw the statement I have made, which is, that it is a perfectly improper legal expression.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): There are absolutely only two propositions before the House, one of which was put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland which has been supported by the Attorney General. I desire to deal with the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen with the respect that is due in each case to their positions; but I must say that I was astounded to hear the Chief Secretary for Ireland suggest, after having put what was so perfectly true—namely, that the Courts of Law in relation to combinations of working men had strained the doctrine of conspiracy to the fullest extent—I certainly was startled to hear him say that an agreement between three or more tenants to fix the price of land or of the rent of land would not be an indictable offence. I see I have correctly represented the position they took up, for the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General indorses that. Do I understand his contention to be that an association or agreement between two or more individuals to fix the price of any article whatever, be it rent or anything else, has not been held to be conspiracy and therefore indictable? The hon. and learned Gentleman stated that no Judge has ever held it to be so, or would ever hold it to be so. I avow that I thought he was wrong when he was saying it, but not daring to trust my memory against such a high authority I took an opportunity of refreshing it, and I have been a little puzzled since I came back with the authority, because I am warned that the Government are not going to act on "fossil dicta" that no lawyer would take up to-day. I do not quite understand such a proposition. I thought, and still think, that every decision in a criminal case is good until it is overruled, and is binding on every Judge of equal or inferior Court, and I have here a case as to which there can be absolutely no doubt at all, in which it was held to be an indictable offence for two or more persons to associate together, and to agree together to fix a price at which they would sell. I admit that there is no magic in the word "conspiracy," and if two or more agree to do a thing, no doubt it means the offence of conspiracy.

[Eigh'h Night.]

In the case to which I am referring, it was held to be an indictable offence to combine to fix the price of salt. That case is surely familiar to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, for it is in the 2nd Vol. of Lord Kenyon's Report, page 300. The judgment given in that case was a judgment upon which men were sent to gaol. It is a judgment that is still part of the law of the land, and which the Courts must feel bound by. Though it may be a fossil dictum on Lord Kenyon's part, it has survived in most modern editions of the Digest. I have refreshed my memory with the modern edition of Fisher's Digest, in which this fossil is preserved. But the hon. and learned Attorney General managed to puzzle me still more. I understood him to argue to the Committee that two or more persons agreeing to do what one might rightfully do by himself would not necessarily constitute the crime of conspiracy. I take leave not only to differ from him, but also to refer him to what is not quite fossil dicta; but relevant judgment on this subject. I will refer him to the 14th Vol. of Cox's Criminal Cases, page 508, where he will find that the Court, in express terms, adjudged exactly the opposite of what he has laid down. The law, or the rulings in relation to conspiracy have been—if one may say so, speaking of the judgments of the High Court—of the very loosest description. It has been held to be conspiracy—and conspiracy is always held to be a crime—to stir up ill-will between classes of Her Majesty's subjects. Now, the Attorney General put it that no honest combination, no combination between two or more tenants who felt that they could not pay and who felt that they ought not to pay certain rent, and who combined for the purpose of getting their land at a lower rent, would amount to the crime of conspiracy, but that it would begin to be a crime of conspiracy when some one or more persons combined who happened to be able to pay, or when persons able to pay began to be connected with that combination or association. Do I understand the learned Attorney General gravely to argue that that is a crime done by a man with money in his pocket, which is no crime in the eyes of the law if done by a man with an empty pocket? I will not venture to put my small—I will not say acquaintance with the law; I will not put it as high as that—but my small study of the law against the opinion so plainly put by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General; but if we were arguing this matter before a tribunal that would have the right to pronounce a definite judgment between us, I should rely with confidence that the decision would not be in favour of the learned Attorney General. But what is sought to be done by these statements of the learned Attorney General? It is sought to impart prejudice into the definition of conspiracy here, so as to carry away the Committee for the moment; but I feel that the good sense and humanity of the Committee will be against declaring that it is a conspiracy for tenants in the position of those described by Sir Redvers Buller as unable to pay who may combine against the rent which Sir Redvers Buller swore was higher than they ought to have to pay. I respectfully protest against having imported into the matter this side issue, for the sake of prejudicing the argument that the Government would not object to those poor people, that they would not seek to prosecute them for combining, and that it is only the people who can pay who would be proceeded against for taking part in the combination. Then it comes to this—that so long as agreement, that association, is between people who by their poverty are unable to give any effect to combination, you will allow it to take place; but the moment the element enters into it, that one tenant who has means to pay says—"I will join with O'Brien, who has not money, and by putting my rent in my pocket, or in some place of safe custody, will induce the landlord to show a measure of justice to O'Brien that he otherwise would not show," then that is a crime. I dare not use the word "nonsense," because it would be impolite, coming from one like myself to one in the superior position occupied by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. Still, I venture to say that that would be the view of the Judges, if such an argument were brought before them. I venture to say that they would make no such distinction between persons who had money in their pockets and persons who had not. The hon. and learned Gentleman pressed the matter further, and said that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby had taken the illustration of the old Trades Unions, and that there was no parallel whatever between the position of the Irish tenants now and the English workmen then. Of course, in a sense it is true that there is never any parallel between things that are different; but there is in this case similarity enough to make the matter of similarity worthy of the consideration of this Committee. What is it that is said? It is said that the construction put by the Courts upon the law of combination was so harsh as to create a wrong for which it was needful that there should be a legal remedy provided for it in this country. Well, I put it that that is exactly what you have in regard to the tenants of Ireland. The conduct of the landlords under cover of law, supported by decision after decision, has been so harsh that, while it may be as perfectly legal as the conduct of the employers against the employed prior to 1875, it produces a state of things that requires some legal remedy from this House. Well, I do not want to obtrude upon the Committee, but I say, notwithstanding what has just been argued by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, that the distinction of "criminal conspiracy" is a distinction which has never been drawn, except, perhaps, on the title page of some book, or on the label or advertisement on the back of it, and that the best test will be to take Viner's Abridgment, Bacon's Abridgment, and Comyn's Digest. Under the head of "crimes" you will find "conspiracy," but you will look for ever before you will find "criminal conspiracy." You will find conspiracy under the head of crimes, just as you will find murder; just as you will find burglary; or just as you will find any other matter which is either felony or misdemeanour. But it is not true that in law—and I say it with all respect—that there has ever been a distinction in our Courts between "conspiracy" and "criminal conspiracy." I cannot speak for what Irish Courts may have done; but I suppose in that matter English law is binding, and there never has been a distinction between what is called a mere honest combination of two or more persons to effect a particular object and conspiracy. In each case it has been a conspiracy, and though the maker of the conspiracy might influence the sentence, it in no case influenced the conviction.

CAPTAIN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I should like to say one word with regard to the illustration which has been given us as to the analogy between conspiracy on the part of Irish tenants not to pay rent, and combinations on the part of English workingmen by Trades Unions. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has put the case as it exists in his view, and he speaks of labour given for wages in England, and labour given for land in Ireland. He asks is the protection which is given to English labour to be denied to Irish labour? But I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the State in England has never attempted to fix wages, and that the State in Ireland has fixed the wages given for labour for land; and the whole point is this—is it to be tolerated that where the State has fixed certain rents, laws, and regulations with regard to the rent of land in Ireland, private conspiracies are to defeat the law of the land? I think that point is very material, and I merely wish to point it out.

Mr. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) here rose, and being called upon by the Chairman, he at once resumed his seat.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I am rather sorry that the Attorney General would not allow the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne to address the Committee, because I was myself, for personal as well as political reasons, rather curious to know how the hon. and learned Gentleman would reconcile his defence of a case like this, with the attitude he took up during the Elections of 1885 and 1886. I shall assume that the hon. and learned Gentleman was going to speak against the Amendment, and in favour of the clause as it stands; and as he gives, by his silence, consent to that, I will give him notice that I shall avail myself of some future opportunity of making a slight comparison between his attitude now and his attitude at the Elections. I should not have risen, if it had not been for the somewhat critical position into which the debate has got, owing to the Boy-cotting or conspiracy to intimidate exercised by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General this evening. I am told—and I have no doubt of the accuracy of the assertion—that if the Attorney General were living in Ireland, and I were in Dublin Castle, and had the working of a Bill like this in my charge, I should be able to bring the hon. and learned Gentleman within the operation of the present clause and find him guilty of intimidation. Let me point to another authority. The Attorney General said that a conspiracy of labour would be as injurious as any other form of conspiracy, and therefore might require as much investigation. Well, Sir, if the hon. and learned Gentleman will accept an offer from me, I will undertake to say very little on any further stage of this Bill, if he will consent to apply as much of this Bill to this country as will enable us to bring the editor of The Times before a secret inquiry in order to find out who supplied him with the forged letter. I know very well that the hon. and learned Gentleman has no intention of doing anything of the kind, and the fact of the matter is, that while every man in this country is at liberty to take part in any conspiracy he likes, for any purpose he likes, yet hon. Members on these Benches, and persons who may go to Ireland, and may go to the impoverished tenantry, and make an offer to assist them in their difficulties as regards rent and their relations with their landlords, if that offer is accepted they will be liable to punishment under this Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General is against Boycotting; well, will he undertake to bring under the survey of this clause the action of the Primrose League in this country?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is, I think, travelling very wide of the subject before the Committee.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I am very sorry, because I think I am approaching a subject which is not at all agreeable to the hon. and learned Gentleman. Now, I wish to put a point that I think is certainly in Order, and which I think is certainly within the narrowest limitations of this debate. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General said a little while ago that such a case as was referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby could not arise under this Bill, and I remember the other night that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland said the same thing. I put this case then, supposing a certain number of men on the estate of the Marquess of Clanricarde combined to get a reduction of 25 per cent from their rents, they would be guilty of conspiracy as this Bill would be interpreted by Stipendiary Magistrates. The Chief Secretary said—

"Not at all; there could be no conspiracy in such an action as that, and there is no Judge who would so declare."

But if the Attorney General will, for a moment, give me his attention—I do not wish to delay him, but his mind does not seem to be bent upon the point with which I am dealing—I want to show him some facts of Irish life, with which, I am sorry to say, he is not very well acquainted. I say that under this Bill, as it would be interpreted by the Irish Attorney General, who is sitting next him, and by the Irish Judges, combinations of tenants on the Marquess of Clanricarde's estate to get their rents reduced by 25 per cent would be an act of criminal conspiracy. That is my statement. That statement was controverted. Now, will the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General be surprised to hear that a learned Judge, not a Tory Judge, and not a fossil Judge, but a man still in the enjoyment of life, and a Member of "another place" so recently as 1881, laid down the doctrine that any combination or any incitement for the purpose of obtaining a reduction of rent was a conspiracy under the existing law. Now, I will read to the hon. and learned Gentleman a passage from the judgment to which I allude. Judge Fitzgerald said, in the case of "The Queen v. Parnell"—

"By the law of the land, what the landlord is entitled to receive is the full rent, and the tenant is called upon to pay nothing more and nothing less"—

Now, I recommend that to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Addison), and I should like to know what he thinks of it—

"nothing more and nothing less, and though these rents have been characterized as rack rents I have now to tell you, with the entire concurrence of my learned Colleague, that to incite tenant farmers not to pay their rent is an offence against our Common Law, and subject to an indictment for conspiracy as a breach of the Common Law."

Now, I wonder do the hon. and learned Attorney General and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne know that that law was laid down in Ireland, and do they agree with that law? Do they agree with Lord Fitzgerald that any incitement to tenants not to pay their rents is an offence against our Common Law, and subject to an indictment for conspiracy? And mark the words which precede this. Judge Fitzgerald says—"The landlord is entitled to a full rent; nothing more and nothing less." Well, then, if we incite the tenants to ask the landlord to accept 25 per cent less than the landlord is entitled to, according to the law, then, we make ourselves subject to an indictment for conspiracy. Is that not the law in Ireland now? That statement of the law may be an absurd statement of the law, may be an idiotic statement of the law, may be a monstrous statement of the law—and I think it is all these things—but it is the law as laid down by Judge Fitzgerald, and it has not been revised on appeal by any other tribunal. And so we have it laid down clearly, as the existing law, that an attempt to induce men to bring about an abatement of their rent would make the persons who do it subject to indictment for conspiracy and bring them within this Bill. And it is in the face of well-known facts like these that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, with his characteristic ignorance of Irish affairs and of Irish law—I am not surprised at his ignorance of Irish law, because there never was such law laid down in the world as that of our country—should get up and say no Judge could possibly decide that which, as a matter of fact, Judge after Judge has decided in Ireland.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I said to-night was, that if three or four tenants agreed together, by combination, to get the landlord to reduce their rents, that would not be a conspiracy.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Then I would remind the right hon. Gentleman of what Lord Fitzgerald said with regard to the law of the land. What does the right hon. Gentleman say to that? Have I not proved that a Judge has decided that which the right hon. Gentleman said no Judge would ever decide—namely, that the incitement of tenants to pay a farthing less than their judicial rents would be subject to indictment for conspiracy, and therefore would bring everybody who took part in it within the lines of the 1st clause and subsequent clauses of this Bill. Now, there is a style of argument used on the Treasury Bench that I strongly object to. They say—"You must trust to the way in which these laws will be carried out—you must trust to their being carried out in a bond fide and honest manner." Trust to an Irish official as to the way in which the law is to be carried out! I am justified in saying this, by the moral character of the present officials in Dublin Castle. I say that, if Dublin Castle were manned by Liberal officials, instead of, as it is now, by men belonging to the Orange combination in Ireland, even then this law would be carried out to the fullest extent. Our old experience is that every single power which repressive legislation gives to Dublin Castle will not only be used, but abused, to the very utmost limits that imagination can conceive, and to the widest interpretation of the law. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the Coercion Bill of 1881. What was said in this House during the whole passage of that Bill? Why, the late Mr. Forster got up time after time and used the words which the Chief Secretary for Ireland is constantly using. I sometimes think that the right hon. Gentleman is quoting to the House what he has imbibed from the speeches of that distinguished statesman. Mr. Forster said, over and over again, that his Coercion Bill was not directed against tenants or combinations of tenants, and that it was not passed for the purpose of collecting rents, and, above all, for the purpose of collecting rack-rents, but that it was passed simply as a measure against crime. And now we have the Attorney General getting up and saying that this Bill is not directed at all against combinations of the tenants, but solely and exclusively against crime. A few days ago I went over a list of the men who were placed in gaol under Mr. Forster's Act. The warrants, it will be remembered, had to set forth the crime of which these men were reasonably suspected; and over and over again in those warrants the crime was stated to be inciting tenants not to pay rents. An hon.

[Eight Night.]

Friend near me remarks that the warrants in which the crimes were set forth were printed warrants; and, as I have said, the crime was over and over again stated to be inciting tenants to intimidation. In the case of Mr. Forster's Bill, we had a measure, professing to be aimed at crime, used almost entirely for the extortion of rent. If we go back in Irish history we find the same thing. In 1846, Mr. Daniel O'Connell spoke of some Acts which gave power to magistrates to whip people in prison; it was said at the time that those powers were not used, but Mr. O'Connell said—"I have known men to be whipped almost to death under these Acts." Now, the moral of all this is, that the pledges made in Parliament have always been falsified, and the Acts, when passed, used to the utmost possible limit. The Chief Secretary for Ireland laid down what appears to be the policy of the Government plainly and lucidly. He said that the Government thought it worth while to inquire into any offence deserving of punishment. Now we exactly understand where we are. A combination against rent, being proved according to the existing law, is a criminal conspiracy; therefore, a combination for the non-payment of rent comes under the 2nd clause of the Bill, and, being under the 2nd clause, it comes also under the 1st clause; and, therefore, we come to this—that the Government claim the right to use their secret inquiry against every combination for the non-payment of rent. In the face of that, I cannot understand how any Gentleman possessed of ordinary intelligence of mind, and even the average conscientiousness of the House of Commons—I cannot understand how any man can get up in his place, and any longer describe this Bill as a Bill directed solely against criminals, and not directed against combinations of tenants. I think I have proved that this secret inquiry will be used by the Government themselves against combinations of tenants. But is this a power which the Government have not got already? Is it not notorious that rack-renting is almost universal in Ireland at the present moment? The Government appeal to Commissioners to prove that Boycotting is going on in Ireland; and, again, they also appeal to them to prove that a large majority of the tenants are unable to pay the rents demanded of them; and, in the face of that, you take powers to suppress by imprisonment every combination for bringing about the reduction of rents. I may say that no more immoral or criminal policy has ever been followed by a Government. But if there is a general combination among tenants, are there no combinations among landlords in Ireland? There are three landlord combinations in Ireland, and they are under the control of the worst landlords there are in the country. I say worst, in the sense of their having been heavily mulcted in the Law Courts. I am not going to say anything about the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman), because I assume that he is so largely occupied in doing the work of the Chief Secretary for Ireland that he will leave the combinations of landlords alone for some time to come; but the three landlords who have been most heavily mulcted are the men who have the landlord combinations in Ireland at their disposal. Does anyone doubt for what purpose combinations under the control of such men will be employed? Does anyone suppose that these men, who are branded for rack-renting, will employ those combinations for any other purpose than that of keeping up rents? Here we have the three most powerful combinations of landlords in Ireland, and they are under the control of three of the most rack-renting landlords in the country, and, of course, these landlords will not endeavour to get better terms for the tenants from other landlords than they are themselves willing to give. Therefore, I think I have shown that these combinations will be employed for keeping up rack-rents, and increasing the number of combinations existing in Ireland. Does the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary intend to use the 1st clause for examining into the working of these combinations? The right hon. Gentleman knows very well that a distinguished man has described the combinations of landlords in Ireland as contributing to the state of civil war and social disorder that exists there at the present moment. The main argument used in "another place" has always been that, as the tenants combined for the purpose of non-payment of rent, the landlords combine for the enforcing of evictions. If this Bill, which is now before the Committee, is for the purpose of putting down the combination of tenants, which is one factor towards social disorder in Ireland, ought it not also to be used for putting down the other factor of social disorder—namely, the combination of landlords? [Laughter.] The Chief Secretary sits smiling in his place, and does not even give me the Cecil nod which we might have expected from his family relationship; but I would ask him whether he sees that there is any possibility of using this clause for the purpose of finding out the combinations of landlords? [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: If there is indictable conspiracy.] Then indictable conspiracy is not the combination of landlords to keep up rents; indictable conspiracy means a combination on the part of the tenants to put down rents. That being so, I know very well that this Bill will leave the landlord combinations absolutely scot-free, and will do nothing to put them down. But is there no other reason why the tenants in Ireland should be allowed to combine at the present moment? Does not the right hon. Gentleman know well that intimidation and Boycotting means the system by which men force others to carry out their will? Does not he know that all these influences are employed now by the landlords for the purpose of forcing purchase upon their tenants? We have stated, over and over again, that the landlords in Ireland have tried to force their tenants into purchasing, and everyone acquainted with social and rural life in that country knows that the landlords or their agents come to the tenants with a notice to quit in one hand, and an agreement to purchase in the other. What happens is this—the Sheriff comes with a posse of police, and then you have the tenant face to face with the eviction of himself, his wife and the children on the one side, and on the other, you have a Mephistopheles with his exorbitant purchase proposal. Are hon. Members surprised that, under these circumstances, the tenant prefers to make a bad bargain, rather than go on the road side? If you take any Tory papers of last year, or look at any of the Tory speeches that have been made, one argument has always been used with reference to the Irish Question. The daily Press, the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Penrose Fitzgerald), every Irish Tory who has spoken on the question, has said in effect—There is no necessity to give this right to tenants to go into Court to get a reduction of rent, they can get a reduction by simple purchase; these gentlemen said that by means of an agreement of purchase they could at once produce a reduction of 25 per cent in the rent of the land; but that is not my way of looking at this question. I think that the tenant should be free to purchase at a rent which has been reduced to its proper level; and I hold that the Chief Secretary, by using this clause against tenant combinations, will be acting most unfairly and most unjustifiably to his own country; because these bad bargains which, under this Bill, will fall upon the shoulders of the Irish farmers, will come in time upon the English taxpayer, and then the Tories and the Liberal Unionists will be left to congratulate each other on having defeated the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian.

Mr. OLANOY (Dublin, Co., N.): I think it right that the country and the House of Commons will, after to-night, at least, know what is practically aimed at by this Bill. The great pretence has been that the Bill is aimed at crime—at criminals, murderers, and persons who attempt murder, arson, and so forth; whereas now we know that it is aimed in reality at peaceable combinations of tenants to effect a reduction of their rents. A question was put to-night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) to the Attorney General for England, and I think that question went to the root of the whole matter; he asked the Attorney General whether this Bill was intended to put down Boycotting attended by intimidation, or, whether it was intended to put down Boycotting unaccompanied by intimidation. The right hon. Gentleman asked for a plain answer to that simple question, and the Committee now knows the answer which was given to it. The Attorney General spoke for a-half or three-quarters of an hour, and from the beginning to the end of his speech he never made an attempt to reply to that question. He evaded altogether the question whether the Bill was intended to deal with Boycotting unaccompanied by intimidation. We are, therefore, entitled to assume that this Bill is intended not only to put down crimes, but also to put down combinations which in this country would be regarded as perfectly lawful and defensible. It seems to me that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) put the case very well when he said that the application of the Bill in case of combinations depended upon whether the tenants had money or not. It appears that where there is money combinations will be protected, and that where there is no money poverty will be made a crime. That being so, the next point is to determine whether they have money or not, and that seems to be left entirely in the discretion of the Resident Magistrates. It will be in the discretion of gentlemen of this class to determine whether the tenants have money or not, and, consequently, whether or not they are to be liable to the penalties of this Bill. That is a nice state of the law. The Attorney General made one statement which I cannot allow to pass without notice. He said that the question as to whether these combinations would be put down or not must be accompanied by the question, "What is their intention?" If there has been anything determined in the course of recent legal proceedings in Ireland, it is that the question of intent has nothing to do with the matter. Again and again it has been laid down by the Judges, as in the case of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), that the question whether the hon. Member had good or bad motives did not enter in the least into the question; they said it did not matter whether he had the best motive, or the worst in the world; but that the mere fact that he had incited tenants to combine for a reduction of rent constituted a crime. I cannot help expressing surprise, as some hon. Members on this side of the House have already done, regarding the statements made with reference to the dicta of the Judges. Some of the most ridiculous and preposterous dicta which have been heard of in the criminal history of the country for the last six centuries have been revived during the last three or four years; and the Judges are progressing from bad to worse in this respect. Five or six years ago they began by reviving obsolete statutes of Edward III. and Charles I., while the doctrine of the inherent jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench to bind a man to the peace with the alternative of imprisonment—a jurisdiction never heard of in England since the days of the Aula Regis—was only introduced last winter. Some of us were amused to-night at hearing an hon. Member representing one of the Metropolitan constituencies, and who it seemed to me did not know even as much about agriculture as what is meant by an acre of ground, tell the Committee, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), the distinction between a strike of operatives in England and a combination among tenants in Ireland. The assumption of the hon. Member evidently was that the tenants in Ireland had no property in the land; but if there has been one thing established, not only by the inquiries of Commissioners, but by the legislation of this House, it is that the land does not belong entirely to the landlord. You talk every day of putting an end to the dual ownership in land, and you talk every day of establishing one instead of two sets of owners—that is to say, you yourselves recognize every day in every word you say that the landlords and the tenants are co-partners in the land. It has been established by the Cowper Commission, by the Bessborough Commission, and others, that by reason of the improvements of tenants, which extend from the building of a house, even to the making of the soil, the tenants have ownership in the land; and, according to my reading, it seems to me that the tenants own more of the land in Ireland than the landlords. Consequently, I think it was rather presumptuous on the part of the hon. Gentleman opposite to attempt to set the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby right in the matter of analogy between the operatives in England and the tenants in Ireland. I believe that we have now reached a very important point in the discussion of this Bill. One would have thought that the Chief Secretary, in the course of his speech, would have condescended to use some arguments in support of his case. He did not, however, attempt anything of the kind; he relies upon his own ipse dixit, which seems, in his mind, to settle everything. He made a remarkable observation to-night, taking it for granted that everyone would believe it, because he said it, though without proof. He referred to the case of Murphy, who was murdered, and he said that, without a clause of this kind, that case could not have been inquired into. The man Murphy is supposed to have been murdered in consequence of something in connection with the hiring and letting of land; and the right hon. Gentleman's argument was that, if you could not bring those matters within the scope of the 1st clause, you could not inquire into the murder at all. Was anything ever said so preposterous as that? It is surely the fact that a man has been murdered that is to be inquired into, and not merely whether Murphy had displeased his neighbours by hiring or letting the land. Under this Bill you can inquire into any murder in Ireland, whether agrarian, political, or other; and, consequently, I think that the argument of the right hon. Gentleman is nothing less than an insult to the intelligence of the Committee. As I have said, we have arrived at an important stage of this Bill. The Amendment before the Committee lets us know exactly where we stand, and places before the Committee and the country what is the exact character of the measure we are asked to pass. The Bill is defended on the ground that it is to be applied to crime and criminals. Now we know that that is not the case. We know perfectly well that, in addition to crime and criminals, amongst the objects aimed at are combinations unaccompanied by violence; and, that being so, I am afraid that the character of the opposition to this measure will not be mitigated in future; I am afraid that a good many Irish Members who have not taken any part yet in the discussion will be induced, owing to the rejection of this Amendment, by the prompting of their consciences and the duty which they owe to their constituents, to take their part in opposing this measure to the very last, no matter what the consequence may be. The character of the Bill is now known; it is one of naked tyranny; it has been proclaimed to be of that character by the statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to-night, and it was so proclaimed in the speech of the Attorney General, when he refused to answer the plain question put to him by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, whether this Bill would be applicable or not to Boycotting unaccompanied with violence or intimidation? I think that the miserable attempt of the Attorney General to evade that question conveys to all minds the knowledge that this Bill is not intended solely against criminals, but against peaceful, social, and political combinations which in England would be protected, and which I hope will continue in Ireland despite this law.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I desire to draw the attention of the Committee to the state of the House night after night, when these matters, which we think it necessary to discuss, are brought forward. I do not say that this is on account of any Boycotting or exclusion directed towards myself; but it is a painful and dreary task to stand up and address an empty Treasury Bench, or a solitary Minister keeping watch upon it. Knowing that the Government will bring every influence and pressure to bear upon their supporters to refrain from giving their honest opinion with respect to this Bill, we have carried before our faces the very practice which the Government profess to be going to put down in Ireland. A few moments ago an hon. and learned Member opposite, who desired to enlighten the Committee by a statement of his views, was at once extinguished by the Attorney General; and I recall the fact that, on the occasion when Irish Members were speaking the other night, the officials of the Tory Party got behind the Speaker's Chair and beckoned out their supporters, so that they might not hear the arguments which we had to urge against this measure. This system of manufacturing Crimes Acts is, I maintain, un-Constitutional. It is therefore hard for us to have any respect for the Bill; and although it is hopeless for us to seek to amend it, I think we cannot be blamed if in the absence of reply to our arguments, we indulge in reiteration, with the hope that something in the nature of an answer may be brought forward.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON said: The Amendment which we are now considering runs as follows:—

"Provided that no examination under this section shall be held in respect of any matters relating to public meetings, or transactions relating to the letting, hiring, or occupation of land, or the dealing with, working for, or hiring of any persons in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation."

We have from time to time been accused in this country, and in this House more or less directly, with being men who, in our hearts, sympathize with crime and violence; we have been accused of encouraging and inciting to crime in Ireland, and our opposition to the Bill is condemned as opposition for the purpose of sheltering crime and criminals. We say to the Government now that our attitude will be seriously affected by the position which they have taken up. We say, as you have conceived it to be right to bring in this Bill, and embarked in the pursuit of criminals, we will offer no opposition to you, provided that you honestly confine your investigation to crime and the cause of crime; but if you use the measure for political purposes then we shall oppose you. Common prudence would, I should think, dictate to the English Government that the greatest danger to social order would result from the fusion of crime and political offences. We are not now, as I take it, on the question of the extent to which this measure shall deal with political offences, and of the extent to which it creates new crimes. We are on this point—the working of the Secret Investigation Clause, and the use which will be made of it in Ireland. And while we are not, for a moment, contesting your right to change your venues for the trial of political prisoners, and to convict them in the ordinary Courts if you can, we object that if you refuse the present Amendment we shall be handed over to the Resident Magistrates, who will consider every act that displeases them an offence, and proceed to apply this torture clause for the purpose of investigating it. What are the things which are sought to be excluded from this inquisitorial process? They are public meetings, the letting and hiring of land, and matters of that kind. Hon. Gentlemen opposite may say that the Resident Magistrates will not seek to inquire into matters respecting which there is no need for inquiry. But we are certain—we expect, and we have reason to believe from experience—that the Resident Magistrates will use these powers for breaking up every legitimate conspiracy—if I may be allowed to use that expression—every legitimate combination of tenants to obtain a fair reduction of rent. If you want to punish a man for speaking at a public meeting, why do you require an inquisitorial clause of this kind? In the first place, the Government have their reporters; you have the speech printed probably in the newspapers; thousands of people are present, for meetings in Ireland, unlike meetings in England, which are made up by means of tickets of a spurious character, are held in the open air; everyone is safe, although he may hold opinions hostile to those who convene the meeting. Why, then, do you take powers to apply this clause to public meetings in Ireland? Then with regard to the combinations of tenants. I cannot enter with authority into these legal matters; but will it not be held that it is right for the tenants to combine for their own protection, just as much as it is right for the landlords to combine for theirs? It must be so; and yet, because it is held by the Judges of Ireland that because their rents are fixed according to a form of agreement recognized by the law, it is said that the landlords have the right of entering into combination to maintain their rents, and that the tenants are wrong, because they seek a reduction adequate to the depression of the times. The opinions of the Judges in Ireland have been quoted, which declare that any combination of tenants to injure their landlords is an illegal combination, and we know the meaning which they attach to the word "injure," because they have defined it as injury to the pocket of the landlord. Suppose that three, four, or six tenants have an aggregate rental of £100 to pay; if they think that the depression of the times makes it necessary to demand a remission of 35 per cent, according to the dicta of the Irish Judges that would be a combination to injure the pocket of the landlord, and, consequently, an illegal combination and a criminal offence. We are not at the moment on the question whether you should punish that combination; we are on the question whether you ought to demand this power of secret inquiry into it—the question of punishment is a wider question, and will come up hereafter. Now, if only the poor men on an estate combine, they will not get what they want, because the landlord knows that they have no money. The landlord knows to the last farthing what is in the till of the tenant; he knows when the postal order comes, and when the green-back comes from America; he has information on all these points; he knows the men who cannot pay him, and against them he will not proceed, because their combination, as far as he is concerned, is perfectly harmless. But let the man say, “I have a few pounds by me that is not made out of the land,” and what happens? It has been laid down to-night that the moment a man who has a little money in his pocket enters into combination this clause is to be applied. Let me state what is the chief objection on our part to the use of this secret inquiry. It is not that we think there is anything discreditable or criminal in the combination of the tenants, and it is not that there is anything that we need fear, or be ashamed of disclosing before the world; but where tenants combine to keep in their own pockets, or place in the hands of a trustee, their money, we object that the power of secret inquiry shall be applied for the purpose of finding out where it is, and putting the men in gaol until their rent is paid. We know that it has occurred time after time that a tenant who has claimed a reduction of rent has been told by the landlord or his agent that if he did not pay he would be put into gaol within the next 24 hours. Do we not know that under the present Tory Government a Government representing the class interested in land in this country and in Ireland, and a Government which thinks it fit and right to give honour and place, if not emolument, to some of the Representatives of the worst rack-renting landlords in Ireland—have we not reason to believe that under such a Government this measure will be used for the purpose of torturing the tenants who enter into combination? Have we not reason to believe that this clause will be used to find out whether there is combination? The practical working of the Act will be this—that where a local landlord finds that his rent is not forthcoming he will instantly go and button-hole the Resident Magistrate, who will get his printed form of authority from Dublin Castle to hold his secret inquiry, and, to break the ring, summon the tenants before him, who, because they make it a point of honour not to divulge what they know about a perfectly legal combination, will be sent to gaol as an example to terrify others who resist the payment of rent. As I do not want to detain the Committee at an inconvenient hour, I will not go farther into this matter than to say that any Government pretending to have before it the idea of maintaining law and order does a wrong thing when they begin to mix up political offences with crime. If there is one thing which you have failed to learn in Ireland, it is that your political opponent, who honestly speaks out his mind, is a person of very different class from those who commit crime. If the Government really intended to use this clause for the discovery of crime that has been committed; if they intended to use it with a view to elucidate and investigate the grave crime which has stained the country, we should have no moral ground to stand upon in opposing them, however un-Constitutional might have been their manner of proceeding; but now we have this ground—that, in the first place, they are un-Constitutional, and that, in the second place, they are confounding together the criminal and the political opponent. You are going to place, side by side, the man who has, perhaps, committed a crime of a disgraceful character—who is possibly spotted with blood—and one of those whom the people of Ireland have learned to respect as their champions. It is for this reason that we ask you to accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I understand the object of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) is to provide that the interpretation of the law in Ireland under this Act shall be identical with the interpretation attached to analogous Statutes in this country. Now, Sir, seeing that this is an exceptional law, it appears to me to be reasonable to demand that no unusual and inconsistent interpretation should be placed upon any portion of it. I believe that part of it is most liable to abuse at the hands of the Resident Magistrates, who are all persons, almost without exception, in an eminent degree unfitted to express anything like a sound opinion of a Statute. The principal danger will be that these gentlemen, acting on their own responsibility and power, and, it may be, on their own initiative, will place an interpretation on this portion of it, such as used to be placed on the Trades Unions Act at first even by the Judges of England—whose interpretation was so wrong in itself that a subsequent Act had to be passed by this House for the purpose of explaining its meaning. I say that when persons in the positions of Judges in this country, who have no object whatever to serve, who have no object even to consider, save a just and fair administration of the law—when these gentlemen of the highest legal eminence and of the greatest ability have involuntarily fallen into error in the interpretation of such an Act, and to such an extent as to necessitate the passage through this House of another Act to explain the previous one, it is only reasonable to infer that Stipendiary Magistrates in Ireland, who know nothing about law, and who are entirely unable to pass anything like an authoritative opinion as to the meaning of an intricate or vague section of an Act of Parliament—it is only fair that these gentlemen should be aided by the Legislature to this degree, that the Legislature, as far as it possibly can, in the drafting of the Bill now going through the House, should be so explicit that even the mind of an Irish Stipendiary Magistrate will not be able to place a false interpretation on its meaning. We heard to-night from the hon. and learned Attorney General for England (Sir Richard Webster) a disquisition as to the relative meaning of the terms “conspiracy” and “criminal conspiracy.” I do not know that it would be possible to differentiate closely between the terms conspiracy and criminal conspiracy, because really the conspiracy which is principally known to the law of this country is criminal conspiracy, because if the conspiracy is not a criminal conspiracy—except in a few instances—it does not come before the notice of the Courts; and this is a Bill dealing exclusively with the Criminal Law. In conspiracy under the Civil Law, there is, of course, an extremely wide interpretation placed on the term; and the English law, so far as I understand it, affords no special encouragement or facilities to persons who pursue criminal conspiracy, who are only guilty of what we may term an ordinary conspiracy, which is not, by itself, either by its aims or objects, anything in the nature of a criminal conspiracy. But, Sir, the very discussion as to the relative value of the two terms, “conspiracy” and “criminal conspiracy,” is reduced to a minimum of importance by the fact that the policy of the Government avowedly is to treat all conspiracies in Ireland in the same manner, and to make ordinary conspiracies, which, by the law of England, are not criminal offences, and by offences crimes—because that is the gradation which the Government have adopted, thereby including all conspiracies, no matter what their character, as criminal conspiracies with the passing of this Act. I consider that course is a most mischievous and most deplorable course. It is a course which would not be tolerated for a single instant in this country. There is not a Judge on the English Bench that would for a moment tolerate the idea of treating in the same way ordinary conspiracy—which may only amount to competition in the way of trade—and conspiracy for a decidedly criminal object. I was looking only to-day at a case tried in the London Courts not many years ago, where it was decided that if the plaintiffs had sustained damage an injunction might be given restraining the defendants from the objectionable course; but the onus of proof would be thrown on the plaintiffs before an English Judge would issue an injunction to restrain the defendants from doing the thing complained of. We know that the principal object of this clause in its application to the state of affairs that may exist in Ireland will be in regard to combination on the part of tenants to induce, or persuade, or compel—if you like—the landlords to make reasonable abatements in their rents. Now, the hon. and learned Attorney General to-day differentiated between the two terms “induce” and “compel.” He did not make the distinction clear; but when he referred to the compulsion of the landlord to accede to the demands of the tenant, he said that any attempt to keep money belonging to the landlord out of his pocket would be a conspiracy within the meaning of this clause, and might be proceeded against accordingly. Now, it is extremely risky to leave to the magistrates in Ireland the interpretation of the terms "inducement" and "compulsion," because we believe—in fact, we know—in the case of Ireland there has been no endeavour made to compel, by unlawful means, landlords to yield fair terms to their tenants. This has never been the practice in connection with the Plan of Campaign, against which this Bill is directed. It does not adopt a method of compulsion at all, but a method of reasonable inducement and persuasion, because it only keeps the money out of the landlord's pocket so long as he remains recalcitrant, and the moment he comes to a more reasonable frame of mind—as did Lord Dillon in the County Mayo—the money immediately passes into his possession. Lord Dillon could not complain of the Plan of Campaign, or of the manner in which his rents were collected. We have a declaration of the law in Ireland which is not a declaration that you can find in England. You can find no such declaration of the law in England; but you can find a declaration of the law in Ireland which will be brought to their assistance, which will be printed in Dublin Castle, and circulated among them for their guidance, and that is the Charge of Judge Fitzgerald in the case of "The Queen v. Parnell." The words of Judge Fitzgerald cannot be too often quoted. He said—"Gentlemen, I declare to you that it is a criminal act to agree;" and then he goes on to give his definitions of criminal conspiracy, the third of which goes to show that an act which may be proper for a single individual to do becomes a crime when done by two or three; and that judgment applying to persons who were at the time agitating to bring about reductions of rent in Ireland will, of necessity, be cited by every Irish magistrate for the purpose of showing that the clause ought to apply in the case of ordinary conspiracy, and that the public examination ought to take place. Now, Sir, it has been contended that there is no analogy between the cases of trades unionists and the case of tenants in Ireland: Well, the case of tenants in Ireland may not afford a perfect analogy. It is difficult to find a perfect analogy between those who earn wages for themselves and those who earn an income for others, and receive no direct wages in return by that process. But I would suggest to the Committee that they may find something of an analogy in the case of the employment of waiters in this country. I understand that it is, in some instances, the custom for waiters to pay for being allowed to serve in hotels and restaurants. We will assume that this is the system in Dublin. Let us suppose that the waiters in one of the principal hotels, where they had to pay £1 a-week, put their heads together—or conspired—to reduce this amount to 10s. a-week. A Resident Magistrate, under this clause, would have a perfect right to hold a private inquiry, and examine these men successively as to the nature of their acts, their conversations, and their arrangements, and on their refusing to answer he might commit them to gaol from week to week, practically for an indefinite period. That, I think, will form a perfect analogy. But assume that anything of that kind was tried here in London, or in any part of England, what would be the opinion of the public with regard to it? Yet it is just as unjust to apply that system to the tenants of Ireland as it would be to the waiters in a London hotel. If the Government had any intention of observing the difference between conspiracy and criminal conspiracy—which the hon. and learned Attorney General insisted on so strongly—they would not have the slightest objection to accepting the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby; and we must only expect this—that the Bill now before the House, instead of being aimed at the suppression of crime in Ireland, will be used, as Sir George Trevelyan has pointed out over and over again since the Bill came before the House in his speeches throughout the country, at political combination. It is aimed at the political opponents of the Government, and it is against men of that class, and not against criminals, that the Bill will be principally put into operation. Well, Sir, that being the case, as I am fully persuaded, I have only to say this—that any man summoned before any of these inquiries in Ireland, ought, as an honest Irishman, to refuse to attend. If, then, viewing the practice on the part of the Government, which amounts to the grossest terrorism, which is invented to intimidate the people under the guise of promoting the preservation of the law—if men see that system adopted by the Government, it is, I say, their bounden duty not to give countenance or toleration to the system, whatever the consequences may be to themselves. They should refuse to attend and refuse to recognize the Court. They should reject it, as others have rejected illegal Courts before. They should repudiate the Court, and should seek to destroy it, as Englishmen, generations ago, sought to destroy the Star Chamber; and I tell the Government that if ever it should come to my lot to be summoned before one of these Secret Courts to give evidence against anything that has happened or is happening I should distinctly refuse to attend such an inquiry.

[Eighth Night.]

Mr. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): Whatever doubts there may have been in the minds of hon. Gentlemen as to the real objects of this Bill, the speech of the hon. and learned Attorney General must have set them at rest. I listened with all the attention I could to the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman this evening, for I was anxious to ascertain from him, speaking as he was on behalf of the Government, what were the avowed intentions of the Government on this subject; and, therefore, I listened, and, as far as my abilities would allow me, endeavoured to understand the explanation which he gave. But, Sir, as I listened to his speech I gradually became aware of the object which was in the hon. and learned Gentleman's mind—namely, that he was anxious to evade the questions at issue. He was splitting hairs from beginning to end. His speech reminded me forcibly of the pains which young counsel recently called to the Bar take to prepare a statement when called upon to give an opinion. They strive to offer an opinion which, whatever shall be the result of the case, will show that they were equally protected in giving that opinion. In reply to the straightforward question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt)

he made statements which were vague to the last degree. Even he himself will admit with me that I am correct in supposing that if a verbatim report of the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech is made to-night it will not find its way into Hansard without very considerable correction. The questions which were put to him were plain and simple. There are combinations existing in Ireland at the present moment—combinations of different characters and for very different objects, but all in the same direction in one sense. Now, we have a combination of landlords in Ireland—a combination for self-defence. We have this combination, the aim and object of which, from beginning to end, is to bring whatever influence they can exercise on the country, with the assistance of the Government or without it, to enforce the payment of rents which the tenants, looking to their own interests, regard as excessive. Now, the combination exists at the present time; but during the whole course of this debate—I do not mean this evening only, but the whole course of the discussion on this Bill—while they have over and over again denounced the combinations of tenants, they have never in any single instance attempted to cast any suspicion upon the combinations of landlords in Ireland. Now, the object of the combination of landlords in Ireland is, as I have said, identical with that of the combination of tenants. There is, unfortunately, a depreciation in the value of land in Ireland. The landlords, on the one hand, have inherited not only their estates, but all the circumstances that surround the holding of property in Ireland at the present time. In the same way, the tenants have inherited the tenancies, and the aim and object of all these associations and combinations is to see how much money can be got on the one hand, or saved on the other. So far as I can see, looking at the matter fairly and calmly, there is no difference between the combinations on the part of the landlords and the combinations on the part of the tenants, which exist at the present time. Both are trying to get that unfortunate difference—the rent—a difference which is equally necessary both to the one and to the other. In the observations of the hon. and learned Attorney General to-night there is one remark which struck me very forcibly. He spoke vehemently, and made all the appearance of giving the fullest possible information upon the subject. So far as I understood him, he gave no interpretation at all of the objects of this Bill or the real intentions of the Government. Towards the close of his remarks he stated that the Government never did intend to coerce or interfere with—that is, so far as I understood him—the combinations of tenants for the purpose of bringing about reductions of rent in cases where tenants are unable to pay it. The hon. and learned Attorney General vehemently said—[Cries of “No, no!”] Am I wrong in the interpretation I put on the hon. and learned Attorney General’s speech? [Sir RICHARD WEBSTER: Yes, certainly.] Of course, if the hon. and learned Gentleman says that, I am bound to accept his statement, and I do accept it. But I did not understand him in the least degree to say that when he spoke. But when you put in your proviso as to giving up the holding you alter the whole question. You make a difference that is impossible, because the giving up of the holding means the giving up, on the part of the tenant, of an absolute interest. Therefore, this was one of the provisos attached to the explanation of the hon. and learned Attorney General with which I am endeavouring to find fault. If you say to tenants having a large interest, by Act of Parliament, in the land, when they have combined not to pay the full rent demanded by the landlord, but who are willing, on the other hand, to give up the land to the landlord, that it is not conspiracy—why, it is not worth the while of the hon. and learned Attorney General to get up and make such a statement in this House. If that is the explanation he wishes to give to the Committee, it seems to me that the explanation is futile in the last degree. But I will take it in the sense in which I understood it, for the purpose of argument. I maintain there is no law against the combination of tenants for the purpose of obtaining a reduction of rent from the landlord—that I maintain, notwithstanding anything that the hon. and learned Gentleman may have said on the subject—though, no doubt, it may be presumptuous in me to do so. The landlord has always his claim at law against his tenants. But the tenants, we say, are rack-rented and unjustly rented, and to say that they have no right to combine in order to secure a fair reduction of rent, and to say that such a combination is a conspiracy—to adopt the new language of the Government on this matter—is a doctrine that I, for one, cannot for a moment accept; for if you start by saying that such an act on the part of a number of tenants would involve them in the penalties of your criminal conspiracies, you are bound, on the other hand, to apply the same law to the landlords. The landlord has his interest, and the tenant has also his share of interest in the law; and, therefore, if it is wrong on the part of the tenant to combine for the purpose of securing a reduction of rent, is it not equally wrong, on the part of the landlord, to continue to force from the tenants the payment of rent which the land has never yielded? But the hon. and learned Attorney General went on to say that there was a great difference between a number of tenants capable of paying their rents, combining to refuse to pay them, and a combination on the part of tenants who had no money to pay. The hon. and learned Gentleman does not deny the correctness of the report I give of his two points. But what earthly difference can it make in the case of a number of tenants declining to pay their rent if some of these have money and some have not? If you said that the money had been earned out of the land I could understand your contention; but it often happens in Ireland that the money with which the tenant has to pay a rack-rent is not money which has been gained from the land, but is money which has been obtained from other sources, and it seems to me that if you draw a distinction between the two classes, it is not a fair distinction in any sense, because in most cases the money which tenants may have in their pockets is money that never came out of the land, but which came from America. Since 1848 the sum of £50,000,000 has been sent by Irish people in America to their unfortunate relatives in Ireland, and the greater portion of that £50,000,000 has gone into the pockets of the landlords in rack-rents; so that the doctrine that the hon. and learned Gentleman lays down in making a difference between combinations of tenants who may have money in their pockets wherewith to pay their rents and combinations of those who have no money amounts to this—that if the law is unable to produce such a result as will enable the tenant to pay the landlord's claim in full, whatever his case might be in the eye of the law if he had no money, it is altered by the fact that money has been sent him by his relatives in America. So far as the explanation of the hon. and learned Gentleman went to-night, it really amounted to nothing; and if, as I have said, his speech were taken down verbatim, and were printed, there are no two Judges or magistrates who would agree upon any single decision, if based upon the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman. This is a Bill which has not been introduced for the purpose of suppressing crime. It has been practically admitted by the Government that there is no crime in Ireland. This Bill is introduced for the purpose of upholding one section of the people against another. It is a Bill introduced—as is shown by the refusal of this Amendment—for the purpose of maintaining the rack-rents of the landlords in Ireland, and for the purpose of giving landlords the power of enforcing the law in order to drag out of these unfortunate people not only the money that the land may have earned, but the money they may have obtained from other sources. The discussion to-night also shows what is nothing new to me—for it was my opinion from the very first—that the second object of this Bill, now scarcely denied, but almost openly avowed, is to put down political opponents of the Government in Ireland. As the hon. and learned Gentleman has said, it scarcely seems worth while to argue at all. We shall all say that—not merely those who represent Irish constituencies on this side of the House, but you who represent English constituencies—when you pass this Bill, however you may torture the law to give it an outward appearance, your difficulties will not be at an end. Your real difficulties will begin the moment this Bill becomes law. You will go to Ireland and endeavour to put into operation the iniquitous clauses of this measure; but I feel perfectly convinced that you will fail.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): If any doubt remained in the mind of any hon. Gentleman in our portion of the House as to the real intentions of this Act, it would be removed by the reception which the Government have given to the Amendment now before the Committee. Why, the Members of Her Majesty's Government have over and over again sought to assure the Committee that there is no intention under this Act, or under any portion of it, to attack political parties, or crush political assemblies which meet for lawful purposes. Now, Sir, that being so, I cannot see, reading this Amendment, what possible objection the Government can have to its acceptance. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), to my mind, devoted the larger portion of his speech to the manner in which this Amendment was drafted; but he did not once attempt to grapple with the very great principle that is involved in it. He passed some very pleasant criticism on the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) drafted this Amendment. He referred to "the looseness" of it, and to the fact that, if adopted and embodied in the clause, it would utterly nullify various other portions of the section which have already been passed through Committee. But even if this were so—if we could allow for a moment that this is the case—it would still be quite within the province of Her Majesty's Government to accept the spirit of the Amendment—to accept its scope, and and move the Committee to alter certain words in it. But it is quite evident, from the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman and others who have spoken on behalf of the Government, that the intention of the Government is to strike at political opponents and crush political associations, so as to render impossible the lawful combination of tenants, or other bodies of people in Ireland seeking to do that which is at present lawful and just. I do not see how the powerful arguments brought forward by the hon. Gentleman the junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) can be met by hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. He has proved to demonstration to-night that in the eyes of the law there has never been a distinction between combinations of two or more persons for unlawful purposes and combinations for a lawful purpose; and, therefore, the Conspiracy Clauses of this Bill contain provisions of the greatest possible danger to the people of Ireland. As far as I understand the language of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for England and of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, they both maintained this evening that there is no desire whatever on the part of the Government to suppress any combination of the tenantry of Ireland seeking for a reduction of rack-rents. But, Sir, when this law comes to be interpreted, the Resident Magistrates who will get the parties brought before them are the Resident Magistrates who will hold the private inquiries. They will not turn up the pages of Hansard to see what right hon. Gentlemen have said—if, indeed, they should take any cognizance whatever of anything which has been uttered in this Committee. What they will look to are the words of the Statute which they will have before them. I would ask the attention of hon. Members to this fact—that all the knowledge and experience we have of magistrates and officials in Ireland emboldens us to say that they will give the widest possible interpretation to this Act in their own interest; that they will make the net as wide as possible so as to bring in every possible case or offence; and that they will make its meshes so small that not the most innocent man will be able to escape. We know the spirit which actuates the men who will have the administration of this Act, and I join with the hon. Member for Mid Tyrone (Mr. M. J. Kenny) in saying that if this 1st clause passes unamended, if the Government do not accept such an Amendment as this brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, the duty will be cast on every Irishman of spirit, upon every man of honour in the country, to treat this clause of the Bill with utter contempt—in his own person if it should become necessary, and in the persons of those over whom his advice has any influence. The Irish people must treat with contempt, and refuse to appear before, a Court of Inquiry instituted in such a manner, and empowered to deal in such an infamous way with the lives and liberties of the Irish people.

MR. H. J. GILL (Limerick): We, on this side of the House, have made various appeals to the Government to agree to this Amendment. If they will not agree to the whole of the Amendment, let them, at least, indicate their willingness to agree to a portion of it. Let us, at any rate, distinctly know what the clause deals with. The only concession which has been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and which has also been announced by the right hon. Gentleman, was that imprisonment under this clause might be subject to appeal. Well, we all know of the "law's delays," and if an innocent man, on account of not answering certain really illegal questions, is sentenced to a month's imprisonment with hard labour and a plank bed, what consolation will it be to him if at the end of the month, after he has gone through his punishment, it is decided that he is really not guilty of what he has been imprisoned for? I think we ought to ask the Government to adopt some alteration whereby it will be immediately heard, so that a prisoner will not be obliged to put in his imprisonment before his case can be decided. We all know, as I have said, of the law's delay, and with the law of Ireland administered, as at present, altogether in favour of the landlords and against the tenants, we can very well form an idea as to what will happen. It has been said that there is no analogy at all between Trades Unions in this country and combinations of tenant farmers in Ireland. An hon. Member said that when labourers or workmen in England struck they only withheld their own, whereas when the tenant farmers of Ireland struck they retained the land belonging to the landlord; but this I believe to be a vague and fallacious point of view. In a great number of handicrafts in England, we all know that the men supply and own their own tools, and when they strike in a factory or workshop they take their tools with them. Well, what are the tools of the tenant farmers of Ireland? They are the barns in which they keep their grain, the stables and stalls in which they keep their cattle, and the places in which they keep their hay and straw. These are their tools, and they are their own just as much as the tools of the artisans in this country are their own individual property. The artisans of this country can take away their tools when they strike; but, unfortunately for the poor tenants in Ireland, their tools are fixtures, and they cannot take them away, although, as I have said, they are as much theirs as the tools of the artizan are his property, and they have just as much right to retain them—I do not say legally, according to the English law, but morally—they have just as much right to retain their tools as have the artizans to keep possession of theirs. I would give an instance in point from the Woodford evictions. The first three or four tenants against whom writs of eviction were issued owed the landlord something like £150; but it turned out that they had property in the shape of farm buildings and other fixtures, which had been erected by themselves or their predecessors, and these were calculated to be of the value of about £600. Still, the landlord could evict them to get the £150 which he claimed as due to him, and on this plea he could actually rob these poor people of £600 worth of property that belonged to them. I think here is an exact parallel between the two cases—the case of the tradesmen in England, and the case of the tenant farmers in Ireland. In both cases the men only tried to raise their wages. The workmen tried to raise their wages directly by getting higher pay; on the other hand, the farmer, eking out a miserable livelihood, and making 30 or 40 or 50 per cent out of his farm, tried to raise his wages indirectly by getting his rent reduced, and obtaining more to live on than he had hitherto possessed. We want this clause to be explicit—a result to be attained by the acceptance of this Amendment—so that it will be known exactly what is to be dealt with. We know the great latitude that is taken even by Judges in deciding upon legal points, and if even Judges experience this great difficulty, what must be the danger of a strained or wrong interpretation in the case of magistrates who, in a great number of cases, have no legal knowledge or training whatever? A case in point, illustrating very forcibly what I am saying, occurred with regard to the Land Act of 1861, when the late Lord Chancellor Law, who actually saw that Bill through this House, and who was perfectly intimate with all the intentions of the Government in passing it, sat on the Bench with two other Judges when a case under it came on for trial. It was the celebrated case coming under what was known as “the Healy Clause.” The contention was that the tenants were not entitled to have their rents raised on account of their own improvements or the improvements of their predecessors. I say that, although Lord Chancellor Law was on the Bench, the other two Judges actually decided against what they knew to be the exact object of the Bill; and by doing that they inflicted great hardship on a great number of tenants in Ireland. There, I say, is a case in point—one of them, a Lord Chancellor, could not agree upon the point of law. How, then, can it be expected that on all these points with regard to conspiracies and public meetings which are touched upon by this clause the Resident Magistrates can come to a reliable opinion, unless everything is laid down in a clear, and distinct, and emphatic manner? Consequently, I think we are within our right in endeavouring to induce Her Majesty’s Government to express their object definitely, and to lay down the law as they wish it carried out, so that the Act may not become an instrument of tyranny against the Irish people. At least let them take precautions to see that this tyrannous measure shall not press too heavily upon the people. I thank the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby for trying to insist on the Government’s acceptance of this Amendment, so that the section may not press with undue severity on the people of Ireland.

MR. J. O’CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): We have heard a great deal this evening about Boycotting and conspiracy. Well, I think we have had some conspiracy here this evening—I will not call it a criminal conspiracy. At any rate, there would seem to be an agreement on the other side of the House to Boycott this side. The Benches opposite were empty for the most part of this discussion—I suppose it is that the discussion is not sufficiently exciting for hon. Gentlemen opposite. According to the law laid down this evening, conspiracy is an agreement to do something, but when there is no criminality attached to it it becomes a combination; herefore, I would say that hon. Gentlemen opposite are a combination, and not a conspiracy. But you see what a wide field the interpretation of this Act has opened up—the interpretation of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. It has opened up a wide field of speculation as to what conspiracy is and what combination means. Now, this Amendment seems to me to be a very admirable one, because I find in the 1st clause of the Act and the 5th sub-section these words—

“The offences to which this section applies are any felony or misdemeanour, or any offence punishable under this Act.”

Now what does “any offence punishable under this Act” mean? What are these offences? They are stated in the next clause. In the 1st sub-section we see that it is to be applied to “an offence which is calculated to interfere with the administration of the law.” This is a very flexible sentence, and may be applied to anything. Why, Sir, in our experience we have found very wide interpretations put upon what is called “interference with the administration of the law.” Let us suppose a number of tenants are asking for a reduction in their rents. Let us suppose that they are not able to pay the rents, and are being evicted. Why, Sir, if any charitably-disposed person, or any charitable association, attempts to erect a hut, in order to shelter the evicted tenants, he or they may at once be described by the Resident Magistrate as “interfering with the administration of the law.” It will, perhaps, be said by hon. Gentlemen on the other side that this is a purely imaginary instance on my part. No, Sir; it is not imaginary. Sir, that interpretation has already been placed upon the ordinary law of the land. I can remember very well—in the year 1881 I think it was—when the tenants of Lord Cloncurry were being evicted, that an association—I believe it was the Ladies’ Land League—sent down a number of huts to shelter the people; but one of the magistrates—whose name is pretty familiar to the House, Mr. Clifford Lloyd—decided, in his great wisdom, that the erection of these huts, in order to shelter these people, would be interfering with the administration of the law, and would be, in itself, an act of intimidation. The huts were sent down, and they remained on the side of the road, whilst the people were shivering with cold; and it was not until a brave lady seized the reins of the Lord Lieutenant’s horse in Dublin that the whole state of things was altered, and the huts allowed to be erected, and that Mr. Clifford Lloyd was censured for his over-officiousness. Well, we go on to see what are the other offences to which this section is to apply, and which may be considered an “interference with the administration of the law.” We see in Sub-section (a) of Section 2 of the 2nd clause that it is laid down as an illegal act—

“To cause any person or persons either to do any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to do.”

Now, how is this likely to apply in practice? We will suppose another case. I will put a case in point that came under my own notice, and within my own experience, lately—the case of the tenants on the Kingston estate in the County Cork, who combined for the purpose of obtaining a reduction in their rents. In this case the Land Court declared, in 1881, the rents of these people to be 30 per cent over what was a just rent, and since that time a Royal Commission has declared that the value of land in Ireland has decreased by about 20 per cent, and consequently these people are rack-rented to the extent of 50 per cent. They combined to ask for a reduction of 20 per cent, but before that combination took place they were visited by certain Members of this House. These Members visited the tenants in order to inquire into the justice of their demands before the Plan of Campaign would be put into operation, and they had to encounter the hostile activity of the police of the district. They were hunted from pillar to post; they had to travel over mountain and moor land pursued by constabulary. Well, if this Act had been in operation, and if this clause in its present form had applied, no doubt the powers they contain would have been exercised in order to deal with the action of the Members of this House to whom I have referred, and to deal also with the tenants on the estate seeking for a reduction of their rent. The investigation would take place under the 1st clause of the Bill, and I have no doubt these Members of Parliament would be now suffering the pains and penalties which they would have incurred as having offended against this Act. But, Sir, we have contended all along that it is for the purpose of keeping up the standard of rent that this Act has been conceived, and is about to be put into operation. But have not the landlords already sufficient guarantees for the collection of the rents? Have they not the power of eviction? Cannot they exercise all the legal power that they already possess for subjecting the tenantry of Ireland to all the pains and penalties which are to be incurred by combining together in order to get their rents reduced? Now, there is another offence which must be considered as interfering with the administration of the law to which I would refer. Sub-section 3 brings under the operation of the Act any person "who shall take part in any riot or unlawful assembly." What is an unlawful assembly in Ireland? Who is to decide what it is? Why, Sir, according to the practice of the last few weeks, two Resident Magistrates can decide what is an unlawful assembly. We have seen, for the first time in our experience—for the first time in the history of the great movement in which we are engaged—we have seen that it is practically in the hands of two Resident Magistrates in Ireland to declare what an unlawful meeting is. Well, I can quite conceive these Resident Magistrates prohibiting every meeting that could be held for any conceivable purpose in Ireland. It is only a short time ago—in the course of last winter, I think—that we held meetings in Cork that were rudely invaded by the police, and scattered with bayonets and batons without any proclamation at all, without any declaration on the part of a single Resident Magistrate even, but simply upon the word of command of some petty officer of police. I have no doubt, from the manner in which these men have been treated since—the way they have been singled out for promotion by their superiors—that though this action was condemned by the tribunals of the country, I have no doubt, I say, that these Resident Magistrates would have exonerated them from all blame, or that their superior officers, who have promoted them, would have no hesitation, under similar circumstances, in proclaiming the meeting in the first instance which led to their attack upon the people, although those meetings would be perfectly legal in their object. I have no doubt that, under the circumstances, the meeting would be dispersed, and that those who took part in them would be subjected to all the indignities and the punishments legalized in the 1st clause of this Act. Now, we have also had it stated that this Act can be applied to the system known as Boycotting in Ireland. But Boycotting is the outcome of the land movement in Ireland, and so long as the land movement lasts you will have Boycotting. I hold with the statement made by Lord Salisbury in his Newport speech. I hold that as the Crimes Act failed to suppress Boycotting so also will this Act. Boycotting will continue in some shape or other, and this measure will prove quite as futile for the purpose of suppressing it. Now, the combination by landlords has been dwelt on by many speakers in the course of the evening. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said that this Act would apply to combinations of all kinds. But who is to determine what is an illegal combination of landlords? Who will say that a combination of landlords is illegal? Is it the Chief Secretary for Ireland who will have to settle the matter? Is it the Attorney General for Ireland? Is it the landlords' friends at Dublin Castle? Who will tell me that any of these authorities will say that the Cork Defence Union is an illegal association? And yet it interferes with the administration of the law. I stand under the correction of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Penrose Fitzgerald) when I say that the quarrel which exists at the present time between the tenants on the Ponsonby estate and their landlord would have been settled long ago if it had not been for the interference of that nefarious institution, the Cork Defence Union, the president of which association sat in this House and listened to the speeches of his distinguished Leaders to-night, and a distinguished Member of which sits behind the Front Bench opposite. No, Sir; the Government will not say that the landlords' combinations are illegal, and I take it that while this Act will be put into operation against combinations of tenants, combinations of landlords will be allowed to take place under the Act. I have no doubt that, no matter how defective and ridiculous may be the means resorted to in order to suppress tenants' combinations, the landlords' combinations will be allowed to go scot-free. I believe the operation of this Act, unless it be prevented by the acceptance of an Amendment such as that before the

Mr. J. O'Connor (Tipperary)

Committee, will have a most detrimental effect on the condition of the country. It will simply, as Lord Cowper said before, drive discontent beneath the surface. You are by this Act about to sow the storm, and I have no hesitation in predicting that the Government, if they live long enough, will reap the whirlwind. I believe, however, that the Committee will see the wisdom of attaching considerable importance to the Amendment that is now before us.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): I rise for the purpose of addressing some few observations to the Committee. I shall not intrude for any length of time on the attention of Members, and I think it is not the intention of my hon. Friends to prolong the debate. We have some reason to complain that the interpretation of Amendments of this kind are given by English Law Officers in this House in such a manner that they cannot be availed of by us afterwards in Ireland. It is a very significant fact that while an Act of this kind is passing through Parliament we have an interpretation of the law from English officials which gives, and very fairly, the interpretation of the law as it is rendered by English Judges; but we have no expression of opinion from the Irish Law Officers, who will have to take part in the administration of this Act in Ireland, and whose words we should be able to quote in the future if we saw that an undue or illegal use was being made of the powers contained in this clause. Probably it is not very wise to try to flog a dead horse, and it is hardly worth while endeavouring to draw a nice distinction as to some of these Amendments. What I believe of the Crimes Act is this—that it will be in Ireland whatever the Government like to make it; and no matter what Amendments we may succeed in getting adopted, the Government will still be able to pervert the measure to any use they may desire. If the Government put this clause in force as it at present stands, you will have a state of confusion and disorder in Ireland in regard to associations, organizations, and public meetings; and if there is any Amendment better calculated than another to raise an issue upon this matter fairly before the Committee, it is that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt). It fairly raises the question as to whether there is an honest desire on the part of the Government to grapple with serious crime, or whether there is not. If there is a serious and honest desire on the part of the Government to grapple with grave crime, then they will be careful not to pass this measure in such a way that the provisions which are meant to deal with serious crime will be used against offences which, in the ordinary sense of the term, cannot be regarded as crime. Everyone knows that a provision such as this in the 1st clause is an exceptional and extraordinary provision, and one which the Government could not attempt to justify under the ordinary circumstances in any country. Yet it is proposed that this extraordinary power, which amounts to a revival of the Star Chamber, which the Government have brought in, and which they have pretended before the public is meant to deal with serious crime—it is now proposed by the Government that it is to extend to every petty offence—for that I gather from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland—that whatever can be punished under this Act is also worthy of being inquired into, and being inquired into under the extraordinary provisions which are contained in this measure. Well, I wish to state to the Committee what the inevitable result of that will be. We have every desire to assist the Government, if it is their intention to extirpate serious crime from Ireland. It is our interest to do so more than it is the interest of the Government, and we have always strived to act as far as we could honestly in the endeavour to stamp out serious crime in the country; but the Government, while professing to aim at serious crime, brings into the secret inquiries which will be held all sorts of questions that arise, and all the relations between landlords and tenants; and they bring in, at the same time, a provision which will set the whole of their machinery out of gear. You will have the same machinery to deal with serious crime as you will have to deal with petty offences, and a feeling will grow up in the country that the men who give evidence before your secret inquiries with regard to petty and political offences, which the people of the country do not recognize as crimes, will be regarded as traitors; and in course of time you will be unable to draw a distinction between the man who refuses to allow himself to be examined as to his own or his friends' political action, and the man who refuses to allow himself to be examined where the subject of the examination is a serious and heinous offence against which the whole public opinion of the country might revolt. The Amendment, if adopted, would have the effect of protecting a man who refused to be examined with reference to his political organization, while it would not shelter in the public feeling anyone suspected of being concerned with serious crime. It may not be the intention of the Government to make extensive use of this provision at all. If it is not their intention to do so, I think they will see the desirability of modifying some of its provisions. I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the moment powers like this are put in the Bill and handed over to Resident Magistrates for administration the whole machinery will act in spite of his best efforts to restrain it. Once the machinery is set in motion, once the Irish officials, who have used instruments of this kind before, and who have brought about by their use a state of confusion and disorder in the country which has done greater discredit to the British Government in the country than it has done to the Irish people—once, I say, the machinery is set in motion, no one in the position of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant will be able to restrain its action. Now, I do not intend to occupy the time of the Committee any longer. I will only say that I believe the intention of the Government in introducing this Bill was merely the intention of putting before the country some policy which would enable them to retain Office, and to keep up appearances before the country. There was never a time in my recollection of Ireland—and I think I know the country much more intimately than any hon. or right hon. Gentleman sitting on the Front Ministerial Bench—when it was more peaceable than it is at the present moment. I know very well the argument founded on that circumstance. We know the argument the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Joseph Chamberlain) used the other day as to the condition of our unfortunate country. Even when it is peaceable and quiet, the fact is used as a taunt against us. The other day, in the speech which he delivered, the right hon. Gentleman stated that the condition of peace in Ireland—and I put it to any man who seriously loves his own country whether he thinks it proper to apply such language to another country in whose prosperity he feels some interest—was brought about by the shadow of the Bill which is now passing through this House. Sir, we deny that the peaceable condition of Ireland is brought about by the shadow of this Bill, and I warn the Government that as surely as this Bill will pass, so surely will its provisions be put in force; and, if that is the case, as surely as an absolute state of peace reigns there at this moment, so surely will there follow from the administration of this Act a hopeless state of confusion.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I wish merely to point out—I will not detain the Committee for more than one moment—that under the Indian law conspiracy is never punished unless it is followed by an overt act, and has for its object a criminal offence. According to the law laid down in the case of "The Queen v. Parnell," an act which would be legal if committed by one person, when committed by two or more persons becomes criminal. It is for the purpose of maintaining that definition of the law, and not for the purpose of enabling magistrates to find out criminals, that this Amendment is rejected. It would appear, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government are desirous of having one law for India and another for Ireland. I would point out, in this connection also, that in India they celebrate the Jubilee by releasing a number of prisoners; but in Ireland they propose to celebrate it by sending a large number of Irish citizens innocent of crime to gaol, and by rendering it easy for the Irish landlords to turn their tenantry out into the world homeless, and without the means of obtaining a livelihood.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I cannot agree with the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, or the hon. and learned Attorney General, as to the Law of Conspiracy not being laid down as injuriously to the tenants in Ireland in reference to their holdings as ever was done in reference to the labourers in England with reference to their employment. I was fully under that conviction from what I recollect, especially as regards the law laid down by Judges in Ireland. There was nothing, I venture to say, in the most extreme times of the Law of Conspiracy—I was going to say the worst times, but I do not like to use that expression—as laid down by Judges in England which within the most recent period has not been exceeded by the Irish Judges. I hold in my hand a judgment of Judge Fitzgerald, and will read a sentence from it, and it certainly seems to me to be more “fossil” than anything that the hon. and learned Attorney General has referred to to-night as exploded and impossible of revival, and it is probably that fact which has led to the remarkable silence of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) during this debate. He is describing the various points that arose in the case of “The Queen v. Truitt,” which case led to the Act of 1875—it was to reverse that decision that the Act of 1875 was passed. But the case of “The Queen v. Truitt” was taken as the standpoint and starting point of this decision in the Irish Courts. This is the law as laid down by Judge Fitzgerald—“Where two or more agree to do an injury to a third party”—that, of course, is constructive combination because “The Queen v. Truitt” is the illustration for it, the point there being that no act which results in an injury to a third party, though innocent, if done by one, becomes criminal if done by several—he says—

“Where two or more agree to do an injury to a third party, though that injury if done by one alone of his own motion would not be in him a crime or offence; it would be simply an injury carrying with it a right to a civil remedy.”

That is the very doctrine which, so far as it interferes with the case of labourers in England, is overruled by the Act of 1875. That is the very doctrine introduced as against tenants in Ireland in respect to agricultural holdings. Then, really, the ground upon which the Government have resisted this Amendment is entirely cut away from under them. The hon. and learned Attorney General has not remembered, I suppose, what has been the ruling on these very subjects; and I should like very much to know from the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, before we divide, whether that is actually the doctrine which is maintained in the Irish Courts—whether they are still proceeding in cases of conspiracy on the “fossil” doctrine repudiated, and very properly repudiated, by the hon. and learned Attorney General?

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment, No. 123, standing in the name of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Elgin, &c. (Mr. Asher) has been decided.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I do not think it necessary to detain the Committee any great length of time upon the Amendment which stands in my name. We have heard a great deal of the Criminal Law of Scotland, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Scotland (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson), who explained the Scotch Law, informed the Committee that the Government had no wish to treat Ireland in respect to Criminal Law in any exceptional manner. I claim for my Amendment the vote of the Liberal Unionists, especially those who hail from Scotland. If the Government are sincere in their declaration that they do not intend to treat Ireland with any more severity than Scotland is treated, they can have no objection to my Amendment. Our Friends below the Gangway may also accept this Amendment, and Scotch Members may safely agree that no proceedings shall be taken under this section which would be incompetent under the Scotch Criminal Law. This Amendment is so reasonable in itself, and I am sure so thoroughly in accordance with the views which have been expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour), and the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes), in respect to criminal proceedings under the Bill now before the Committee, that I shall not, in introducing it, trespass upon the attention of the Committee at any greater length.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 12, at end, add, "Provided always that no proceedings shall be taken under this section which would be incompetent under the Criminal Law as administered in Scotland."—(Mr. Esslemont.)

Question proposed, "That these words be there added."

No Member of the Government rising—

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): It is a monstrous thing that the Government, who boast of their anxiety to apply the principles of the Scotch Criminal Law to Ireland—[An hon. MEMBER: "Oh!"] Who is it that cries "Oh?" I suppose he is some Scotch Gentleman. [The CHAIRMAN: Order, order!] I am only sorry we do not recognize the Gentleman. I say it is a monstrous thing that the Government, who have been boasting of their anxiety to apply the principles of the Scotch Criminal Law to Ireland, should attempt to allow this Amendment to be negatived simply on the declaration of the Chairman. If there is any Amendment upon which we should have a reply it is the one now before the Committee. The Government profess to be anxious to apply the Scotch Law to Ireland, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay), who I am sorry not to see in his place, in a speech which was commented upon so admirably by Sir George Trevelyan, declared that he was not opposed to this Bill, because, in the main, it only applied the Scotch Law to Ireland. I never read a more weighty speech than that of Sir George Trevelyan, exposing, as it did, the hollowness of this pretence. And now, when a Scotch Member proposes that no proceedings shall be taken under this section which are inconsistent with the Scotch Criminal Law, the Government remain silent, in order, I suppose, that it may not go before the country what their exact position is in regard to this matter. Under these circumstances, I can only point out the curious fact that, whereas in the country the Government's main defence of the Bill is that the Bill merely extends the Scotch Law to Ireland, in the House of Commons, when an Amendment is proposed providing that only the Scotch Law should prevail in Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who has so little to do, according to the statements which appear in the newspapers that yesterday he had 16 hours sleep out of the 24, and who only comes down to the House at 5 or 6 o'clock in the evening when all the work is over, cannot find a single word to say on the subject.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It was with no wish to be discourteous to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Esslemont) that I did not get up earlier to reply to him. The truth is my reply is very short. In the first place, the accusation largely made against this Bill is that the Resident Magistrates who have to use the Bill are gentlemen unacquainted with the English Law. If this Amendment were carried, the Resident Magistrates would not only be required to know English Law, but Scotch Law too. If that reply is not sufficient there is another one—it is that no English Judge can take any cognizance of anything but English Law. Under this Amendment, Resident Magistrates in Ireland would have to have regard to Scotch Law. Under these circumstances, the hon. Gentleman can hardly expect us to accept his Amendment.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid), who was received with cries of "Divide!"—If hon. Gentlemen opposite do not care to hear some remarks from me on the Amendment, they may hear some remarks from me on a Motion of my own. If the only difficulty in the way of the acceptance of this Amendment is that Resident Magistrates would have to have some knowledge of the Scotch Law, it would be very easy to get over the difficulty. I am not aware that the Irish Resident Magistrates have any particular knowledge of English or Irish law. Now, the Government might send over to Ireland the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald), who I believe is the distinguished author of a distinguished book on the Criminal Law of Scotland, to instruct the Resident Magistrates there in Scotch Law. I have no doubt that in a very short time he could make them adepts in the law of his country. But if the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not care to go across to Ireland he might send over a few copies of his book for the use of the Resident Magistrates. The objection to the Amendment advanced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour) is like most of the objections advanced from the Treasury Bench against Amendments proposed from this side of the House. As far as I can understand it, it is absolutely invalid. Not only the Chief Secretary, but all the principal supporters of the Government have been going through the country during the last two months and preaching what is not the fact—namely, that there is nothing in this 1st clause which is not already contained in the law of Scotland. Some of them have drawn the moral that under the existing law the Scotch people have managed to be pretty free from crime, why should not the Irish people be equally free from crime under it? If that is the bona fide contention of the Government, let them accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Aberdeen (Mr. Esslemont), which merely compels the acknowledgment of the fact that nothing can be done under this clause which cannot be done under the law of Scotland. We could not do better than Divide, in order to make it clear that the assertions which have been made by Ministers and their supporters have been quite erroneous.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I must say that the Government's reply upon this subject, coming from a Scotch Gentleman, as the Irish Secretary generally is, is most surprising. I had thought that if there was anything which would invite acceptance, it was an Amendment appealing to the Scotch soul of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It cannot be too much emphasized that this is a proposition taken, so to speak, from the very bowels of the Scotch law. We have had from the Government a distinct declaration, and one upon which the Primrose-Orchid Party has, to a large extent, founded its position—namely, that this Bill contains nothing but what is to be found in the law of Scotland. The hon. Gentleman the Member for East Aberdeen (Mr. Esslemont) has proposed an Amendment to test the sincerity of the Government. What is the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland? It is an appeal to ignorance. He says that if the Irish magistrates cannot be expected to know Irish Law, how much less can they be expected to know Scotch Law. All the Government need to do is to present each Resident Magistrate with a bound and gilt copy of Macdonald on the Scotch Law; they would thus confer a favour upon a distinguished servant of their own, and, at the same time, give great assistance to the Irish Resident Magistrates. From the start the Government have pretended that it is only the law of Scotland that is to be applied to Ireland. Under these circumstances, I should have thought the Government would have hailed with pleasure this Amendment. Instead of that they say that the Irish magistrates cannot be expected to understand Scotch law. They certainly do not understand Irish law. Apparently, the idea of the Government is that they shall not know any law at all.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I am sure the Committee will not be surprised that I feel great disappointment at the way this Amendment has been received. We have been blamed for consuming too much time in an opposition to this Bill. [Ministerial cheers.] Mr. Courtney, you see how unreasonably one is treated. I have not spoken on the Irish Question in this House before this. I have not occupied a minute of the time of the House. But I have heard in my country, and out of it, that we are making a criminal law for Ireland exactly similar to that which has prevailed in Scotland for generations. We are told that it is in consequence of the excellence of the Scotch Criminal Law that the Scotch people are the quietest and best conducted people in the world. We have been told by every Tory lecturer on this question that if we only apply the Criminal Law of Scotland to Ireland we shall make the Irish people as happy and as prosperous as ourselves. I wish to settle the point by putting Ireland in the matter of procedure upon exactly the same criminal code as Scotland. I have been exceedingly modest in this demand. I have not asked you to make the crimes in Ireland the same as the crimes in Scotland. We have been told that new crimes are to be created in Ireland; but I am content, whatever the crimes are, that the proceedings shall be conducted in the same way as they are in Scotland. It has been my duty for 20 years to have something to do with the administration of the Criminal Law in Scotland, and I am bound to say that I was very much astonished at the description of that law which was given by hon. Gentlemen on the Government Bench. Certainly, I was never allowed to take such proceedings as are proposed in this section. I hope that the Government will either declare that there is no reference to the criminal code of Scotland here, that henceforth the pretence that the Criminal Law as laid down in this Bill is similar to that in Scotland will be given up, or that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) will give us his powerful elucidation of this subject and show wherein the provisions of this Bill do resemble the provisions of the law of Scotland.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I think the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland is somewhat encouraging, and marks a step in advance, for it seems to indicate that now he has come to the conclusion that some knowledge of law on the part of those who are to administer this Act is necessary. An Amendment providing that the Resident Magistrates in Ireland, to whom the administration of this Act is to be entrusted, should be gentlemen with some knowledge of the Irish Law, was most bitterly opposed by the Government, and by no Member of the Government more strenuously than by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman on which leg he means to stand? Formerly he seemed to be of opinion that no knowledge of law on the part of the magistrates was necessary; now he seems to be of opinion that it is necessary that the magistrates should have a knowledge of law. I should like him to select on which leg he will stand.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman must seriously address the Committee.

Question put, and negatived.

THE CHAIRMAN: The point contained in the Amendment 123b was decided upon the Amendment of the hon.

and learned Member for York (Mr. Lockwood).

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to submit, Mr. Courtney, that the hon. and learned Member's Amendment related to offences committed after the passing of the Act, while my Amendment refers to offences committed prior to the passing of the Act. I think that is a very substantial difference.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): The Amendment is also governed by the Amendment standing in my name, accepted early in the evening.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is so. The Amendment adopted at the beginning of the evening provided for offences committed before the passing of the Act.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I submit to you, Sir, that the Amendment moved by the hon. and learned Gentleman in no wise affects my Amendment. The Amendment of the Attorney General exempts from the operation of the Act a certain class of offences committed prior to the passing of the Act. My Amendment proposes to exclude certain other classes of offences.

THE CHAIRMAN: It was decided early in the discussion that there should be no universal exemption of offences, whether committed before or subsequent to the passing of the Act. Then it was decided, on the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, that there should be a partial exemption in the case of offences committed before the passing of the Act.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to give Notice, that I shall move my Amendment on Report.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment which can be taken is No. 124.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn): I desire to move 123f.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think that has been decided already. However, as I fail to discover the Amendment which governs the hon. and learned Gentleman's, perhaps he had better move it.

MR. ANDERSON: The Amendment 123f is one to which I attach very considerable importance. It is that to insert—

"In case of its being intended to call any witness examined under this section in support of a criminal charge, notice thereof shall be given to the accused ten days before the trial or hearing. The accused, by himself or his solicitor, shall be entitled to see and examine such witness, and for this purpose shall be entitled to call for the production of such witness at any time and place in the proclaimed district."

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I consider the question was decided by the adoption of the Proviso—

"Provided also, that upon any person being accused of a crime respecting which an inquiry under this section has been held, such accused person, or his solicitor, upon being returned for trial, shall forthwith be supplied with copies of all depositions taken at any inquiry under this section of any witness to be called against him."

MR. ANDERSON: I beg to point out that the distinction between the words you have read and my Amendment is obvious. The Proviso which you have read enables the accused person to have a copy of the shorthand notes. The giving of the shorthand notes is quite another thing to what is referred to here. My Amendment provides that the prisoner shall have the means of seeing the witness and take his statement from him. I have in mind a case where a witness in Edinburgh was actually imprisoned, and the Crown refused to let the prisoner's counsel or agent see the witness. The result was that when the trial came on objection was taken to the evidence of the witness, and the Court said that application ought to have been made to enable the prisoner's counsel to see the witness. It is laid down in the Scotch law books that a prisoner's counsel is entitled to see at any time any witness, who has been called privately and examined, and to take his statement. I think you will see, Mr. Courtney, that this Amendment is quite distinct from the Proviso you have read. Now, to my mind, this is a matter of great importance, because the Crown establish, by the provisions of this clause, that they are entitled to examine, secretly and privately, a witness. I maintain it is only fair, if that is so, that before the trial comes on the prisoner ought to have an opportunity of seeing the witness, and of hearing from the lips of the witness what he has to say. The principle embodied in my Amendment is clearly laid down in Alison's work on the Scotch Criminal Law, a work which was quoted the other day by the hon. and learned Gentleman the late Solicitor General for Scotland (Mr. Asher). After showing that a prisoner is entitled to see a witness, the writer goes on to point out a case in which a man was imprisoned in the Castle at Edinburgh in 1819, access to the witness was refused by the Crown, the witness's precognition had been taken, and the prisoner's counsel, or agent, did not know what the witness had to say. Objection was taken at the trial that his evidence had not been received, and the Court pointed out that an application ought to have been made for an order to produce the witness to the agent of the accused. Now, I cannot help thinking that this is a matter of great importance, because what the Government may possibly do under this Act is to put a whole country side into prison, and evidence against the prisoners be kept secret until the day of the trial. Surely it is only fair that the agent of a prisoner should be able to see every witness, inasmuch as this principle has been laid down and emphasized by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate (Mr. J. H. A. Macdonald) on his excellent work on the Criminal Law of Scotland. I hope the Government will embody some part of the law of Scotland in this Bill. Hon. Members cheered loudly just now when they threw over the whole law of Scotland upon the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for East Aberdeen (Mr. Esselmont); but let me ask the Government to accept some small part of the law of Scotland, the part of it which is fair and just, and which ought to be introduced in this section.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 12, at end, add—"In case of its being intended to call any witness examined under this section in support of a criminal charge, notice thereof shall be given to the accused ten days before the trial or hearing. The accused, by himself or his solicitor, shall be entitled to see and examine such witness, and for this purpose shall be entitled to call for the production of such witness at any time and place in the proclaimed district."—(Mr. Anderson.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I assure the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Anderson) that it is no light matter for me to discuss the law of Scotland. He, no doubt, has given that law a great deal of study; but I ask him to look into the English law, and acquaint himself with the elementary principles of that law which are known to every Justice of the Peace and Clerk of Petty Sessions. If he were acquainted with that law he would know this—that when a prisoner is returned for trial the witnesses are produced and examined in his presence; that he has a right of cross-examination by himself, or solicitor, or counsel; and that the depositions are read to the witnesses afterwards, and signed by them; and after all that is done the man is returned for trial, and they are the witnesses on whose evidence he is returned for trial. The object of this clause is to obtain evidence in the first place, which is not procurable without the holding of some such inquiry as is provided for under this section; but after we have got evidence it will be seen by the clause itself that we contemplate that the ordinary procedure in criminal cases must follow. The witnesses will then be produced, the prisoner will have an opportunity of examining them, and will be returned for trial in the ordinary way. In addition to that we have undertaken to give a prisoner shorthand writers' notes, so that he will not merely hear what the witness has to say, but he will have in his possession all the information the Crown will have on the subject. We certainly cannot, if the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman means anything more than that—or if the law of Scotland contains any other provision than that—accept the Amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am exceedingly indebted to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) for giving me instruction in what he is pleased to call the elementary Criminal Law of this country. I assure him that I shall take that lesson to heart and study the law; but I may also assure him that it is about time that he should study his own Bill. He does not appear to know that all the cases under this Bill which are liable to preliminary examination are cases in which the magistrate may summarily convict, and he is probably aware—I see by his manner he is aware now—that in those cases there is no preliminary examination before a magistrate. At present you will have your private inquiries, and then you will have your summary procedure and commit a man for six months, possibly. What I want to provide is that the accused shall have the means of access to, and take the statements of, those persons you have privately examined. In future, before the right hon. and learned Gentleman gives lessons in English law, I hope he will get up his own task a little bit better. With regard to the second point, the right hon. and learned Gentleman is entirely wrong. I am quite aware that it is part of the elementary procedure of the Criminal Law of this country that, before a man is committed for trial for an indictable offence to be tried by a jury, there is a preliminary investigation before a magistrate. That is what the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to; but it has been known in the history of the Criminal Law of this country that without a preliminary examination witnesses have been obtained, and obtained secretly, by the prosecution. There have been cases in which, after preliminary examination before a magistrate, after the cross-examination to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred, you have found two or three witnesses, you have taken their precognition in a secret manner, and you have immediately locked them up in prison, and then there is no examination after that. I know you give notice; but I want more than that. From what I have seen of them in this Bill I am entirely distrustful of the Government. Mr. Courtney, every safeguard ought to be put on the operation of this infamous clause; and unless there is some more clear explanation from my right hon. and learned Instructor on the Government Bench I shall press my Amendment to a Division.

MR. HOLMES: I think I must give the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Anderson) a little more instruction on the subject. Upon what authority does he suppose that prisoners or witnesses are to be locked up in prison? I think that if there was anything of which the Committee was satisfied it was this—that a magistrate had no power whatever, after the evidence was taken, to do other than dismiss the men to their homes. What does the hon. and learned Gentleman mean by locking up in prison; what does he mean by saying we can put a whole country side in prison? Certainly he does distrust the Government of Ireland very much if he thinks there is a wish in this country to lock up men in prison without any law, when the result would be that every man so locked up must inevitably get the very heaviest damages. It seems to me that when the hon. and learned Member talks about persons being locked up in prison without lawful authority he is simply trifling with the Committee.

MR. ANDERSON: I am beginning to feel that I must assume the position of tutor, instead of that of pupil. I never suggested for a moment that a witness was to be locked up because of his evidence. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Certainly not. I am suggesting that, by the course of proceeding you are going to adopt, you will take up a great number of people, and obtain evidence from them which a prisoner will not be able to see. It is perfectly evident that men will be taken out of their cells and examined at these private inquiries. That is the kind of examination I was referring to.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I am sorry I cannot congratulate the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland upon the success of the method he has adopted in dealing with this Amendment. I do not think that method of controversy will at all tend to advance the progress of Business. Now, the Amendment which is before us provides that every witness for the Crown shall, if the accused so desire it, be subjected to examination by the accused person, and that, in case of its being intended to call a witness, 10 days' notice shall be given to the accused. Now, the answer of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland is that the proposition is wholly unnecessary. Unnecessary, because the witnesses were produced at the preliminary proceedings in open Court previous to the committal for trial, and that on that occasion the prisoner was entitled to cross-examine. Does he mean to say that every witness who is examined at a trial for a criminal offence is produced at the preliminary examination before a man is committed for trial? We know perfectly well that such is not the case. We know that the process in Ireland very often is this—that one of the Resident Magistrates, or Orange land agents, bring forward one or two flimsy witnesses whose evidence is quite enough to get a man sent to trial, and that at the trial a whole body of really substantial witnesses are sprung upon the accused. This is what we desire to prevent. We wish to prevent you, after a man has been committed for trial, taking privately other witnesses, because it is perfectly obvious that the prisoner will have no opportunity whatever to examine or cross-examine those witnesses until he stands in the dock and takes his trial, possibly before a Northern Orange jury. I suppose this Committee assumes that the accused, by himself or solicitor, is entitled to see and examine witnesses. I recollect a civil case in which the plaintiff was a gentleman of very infamous name and character—Mr. George Bolton. He not only robbed his wife of a large sum of money, but he also had the distinguished record of having seduced her servant girl of 20 years of age. His conduct was severely reported upon by an English Judge; but, in spite of his peccadilloes, he retained three Government offices—I recollect a case in which this gentleman was plaintiff, and Mr. W. O'Brien defendant; the case was sent by the Queen's Bench to be tried before an Orange jury in Antrim. I wished to examine one of the witnesses for the defence; but this witness, however, I found guarded by a number of policemen. In attempting to take the evidence of this witness I was arrested and brought to gaol. Now, this was a civil proceeding; Mr. W. O'Brien was charged with no offence except the offence of having said the truth as to this infamous blackguard, who still retained three Government offices. I wonder whether the Committee really knows in what manner Crown witnesses are dealt with in Ireland. A Crown witness—especially if he is an informer—is taken outside Dublin and kept there, provided with pocket money. The Crown officials go out from time to time to teach him the story he is to tell in the witness-box, and no one sees that witness until he is produced in Court under escort. These are the reasons why we think the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Anderson) should be adopted, and I must say that the reply of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland was not, to say the least of it, very ingenuous.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I think the Committee would be well advised to refer again to the second Proviso inserted. The language of that Proviso only means the case of a person returned for trial, and I think we are very much obliged to the hon. and learned Member who moved this Amendment (Mr. Anderson) for calling attention to the utterly unprotected state of a person accused of crime and tried summarily for what is not an indictable offence. Now, in that Proviso, if a man is sent forward to be defended by an able counsel, before a Judge who would be certain, or who it is presumed would be certain, to see that the man got fair play, copies of the depositions taken in secret would be handed to the counsel; but where he is to be tried summarily, presumably without the advice of counsel—where he is to be tried having only such legal assistance as may be at hand at very distant parts of the country—no provision is made for handing the depositions over. I would now, at this stage even, ask the Government whether they intend that a person should be charged, tried, and sentenced for what is really an indictable offence without having at his trial every means of defending himself properly? The Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman is one which ought to appeal with double force to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland; for he said, when we asked that prisoners should be supplied with copies of the depositions—"Remember, if you do get them, that we also will have the right to use them for the purpose of cross-examining the witness if he goes back on his statement." He did not exactly put it in these words, but he meant what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. I ask the Representatives of the Crown whether they will, on report even, agree to give a prisoner tried summarily an opportunity of seeing the depositions? I think that would go a long way to meet the case which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Anderson) has put forward. I think the Committee will agree that a prisoner tried summarily should have the same rights as if he were tried at Assize before a Judge and jury, and his counsel was provided for his defence. There are cases—and the hon. and learned Gentleman very properly mentioned them—in which witnesses are brought forward against the accused whose depositions have not been taken in his presence, of whose statements he knows nothing, and whom he has had no opportunity of examining. There are cases frequently happening in which, in consequence of some charge against the witnesses themselves, they are not accessible or are actually kept in custody, very often for the purpose of preventing them being spoken to by others upon the case. I submit that for all these reasons some assurance should be given us that the Government will, at least, accept the spirit of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): Up to the present time the debate upon this Amendment has been conducted exclusively by legal Gentlemen. I think it will be acknowledged that we have been treated to some pretty fencing by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes). Certainly that right hon. and learned Gentleman confused me, and I have no doubt he confused a great many hon. Members on his own side of the House. The ordinary spirit of all English law, even of a court martial, is that the defence should be placed, at least, on an equality with the prosecution; that the defence should have the same power of knowing what is going on as the prosecution. That is obviously fair. In a good many cases, certainly in most murder cases, counsel for the prosecution even go further, they even show their brief to the defence, and do not expect the defence to show their brief to them. Under this clause the Government will be able to see all the witnesses they want and examine them secretly; but the defence will not know witnesses have been examined. In this way the prosecution will possess an enormous advantage over the defence. Now, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson) proposes an Amendment which will put the defence again upon an equality with the prosecution. In reply to the Amendment the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland made a very clever speech, but I think it was more ingenious than clever. He said—"Oh, yes; you are on an equality. Under the present circumstances, witnesses are taken up before magistrates before trial, and the defence can cross-examine the witnesses." But, as was very properly pointed out by the hon. and learned Member for Elgin and Nairn, the case is quite changed, because the whole object of this Bill is to hand over the trial from a jury to a magistrate. What we contend, and what no doubt is the fact, is that, besides transferring these cases from a jury to a magistrate, you are obtaining a most unfair advantage in getting hold of witnesses beforehand, and having an opportunity of taking down their evidence, while the defence are in utter ignorance as to the evidence of which you are possessed. I can certainly see what the custom in Ireland will be. A great many witnesses, after being examined, will say no more about their examination, and the defence will never know that these witnesses have been examined at all until they are brought up in Court, unless some safeguard such as this Amendment provides is adopted. Now, I think that in common fairness the Government ought to introduce some provision by which the defence will be once more restored to an equality with the prosecution, and will be able to know before the trial what are the depositions of the witnesses, and will have an opportunity of calling the witnesses and cross-examining them. I support this Amendment, because I think that without it you are departing from the ordinary principles of English law in not allowing the defence the same advantages which you allow to the prosecution.

MR. MAURIOE HEALY (Cork): What we want to have done, Mr. Courtney, is this—in the case of all witnesses examined for the prosecution the solicitor for the defence ought, some time before the trial takes place, to have an opportunity of cross-examining them and ascertaining what they have to say. But, as soon as this is proposed, the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, with a great air of triumph, pounces on my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson), and charges him with knowing nothing at all about what he is speaking of, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman goes on to say that the existing law gives the solicitor to the prisoner all the rights and powers which the Amendment asks for. But what is the fact? We proposed, in an earlier Amendment to this Bill, that the power of holding secret inquiries under this clause should cease the moment any man was made amenable—that once a prisoner had been arrested and charged with the offence, there and then any further examination of witnesses should take place in the ordinary way in the presence of the prisoner, and that once the prisoner was arrested, all power of secret inquiry under this clause should cease. The Government refused that Amendment. They insisted on keeping in their hands the power of holding a secret inquiry at any moment down to the trial of the prisoner; and now we may have this state of affairs arise, that this secret inquiry may be held long after the prisoner has been returned for trial. Fresh witnesses may be obtained whom he may have no opportunity of cross-examining at all. The Government have deliberately reserved to themselves this power of getting fresh witnesses, and the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland has the audacity—for I can describe his conduct in no other terms—to get up and tell the House that the prisoner would under the existing law have this power which it is proposed to confer by the present Amendment. Now, Mr. Courtney, let there be no mistake about this matter. It is quite conceivable that sufficient evidence might be obtained against a prisoner to return him for trial. It is quite possible that on the evidence so obtained the prisoner might be returned for trial, and that after he had been so returned for trial the Government might, by means of the machinery of this clause, find it in their power to get fresh evidence, and to have fresh witnesses whose evidence might be of the most vital and material nature, and the prisoner's solicitor and counsel might not have the smallest opportunity of cross-examination. That being so, is it not monstrous that when we propose that, should this clause be oppressive and effective in that manner, the prisoner's solicitor should have the right of having these witnesses before him and of cross-examining them, so as to know exactly what they have got to say—is it not monstrous, I ask, that when we propose this the Irish Attorney General should get up and say we have such a power already? I tell him we have no such power. Like the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself, I have been concerned in a number of cases in which, subsequently to the prisoner being returned for trial, most important witnesses have been obtained, and under the existing law there is no machinery whatever for enabling the evidence to be sifted by any cross-examination on the part of the solicitor of the prisoner. I was defending a prisoner on a charge of murder, and almost on the eve of the trial, three months after the prisoner had been returned for trial, evidence of the most vital and important nature was given by a fresh witness never examined before, and the prisoner had to go to the trial on this awful charge without his solicitor having had the smallest opportunity of testing the value of that evidence and sifting it in the manner in which cross-examination alone would enable us to sift it. Is it fair that when we get up and make this most reasonable demand, that in cases where the action of this clause allows—after the prisoner has been returned for trial—the acquisition of some fresh evidence by means of this secret inquiry—is it fair that when we ask that these new witnesses shall be offered for cross-examination we should be met, first, by a really uncandid statement of what the existing law is, and secondly by a direct negative of the Amendment? It is a most unfair proceeding, and I challenge the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to get up and say that the state of things I have suggested is not possible, and to say whether in fact if the clause be passed in its present shape it is not merely possible but probable. What is the value of this secret inquiry unless it tends to get fresh witnesses? Why do the Government retain the power of continuing these secret inquiries after the prisoner has been returned for trial, and up to the very moment of trial, unless in the meantime they hope to be enabled to get fresh witnesses not examined before, and whom, therefore, the prisoner's solicitor has had no opportunity of cross-examining? I quite grant that in an ordinary case, where all the witnesses are known to the Crown at the time of the examination before a magistrate—I quite grant that what the right hon. and learned Attorney General says is right, because, of course, in that case the prisoner's solicitor might have an opportunity of cross-examination. But the point is, that, under this clause, a fresh machinery is provided for finding fresh witnesses, even up to the moment of the trial. Let us have a clear understanding on this matter. Do the Government insist that the prisoner will have to go into Court without any opportunity of cross-examination? Do they insist that in cases of the very gravest kind where a man's life and liberty are concerned in the most serious manner, the prisoner shall take his trial and place himself on his countrymen without any opportunity of sifting the witnesses who are sworn to give fresh evidence? Such a proceeding is unfair in the highest degree. The Amendment is most necessary and most cogent, and I do trust that some further concession will be made by the Government.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I have not heretofore intervened in these discussions, Mr. Courtney, but I wish to say a word on this point to the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster), who, I am sorry to say, has not been in the House for a while. I have been a good deal absent from the House of late myself, having been unwell; but I sat in the country puzzling myself as to how it was that the Government got on so slowly with their Bill. But I have now discovered the reason, and it is this—that when a blot in the Bill is pointed out to them, they do not in a common-sense English way admit the blot, and try to get rid of it; but they leave it to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) to utter the most disingenuous observations. I see the hon. and learned Attorney General for England present, and he does not seem to agree with my criticism upon his Irish Colleague. Well, I am an Englishman myself, and so is he, and I will put to the hon. and learned Attorney General for England the case which has been made out. I do not quite agree with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson). He seemed to argue, at first, that all prisoners under this clause would not have the opportunity of seeing the depositions; but he afterwards, on consideration, came to the conclusion that in cases that were sent for trial the prisoner and his solicitor would see the depositions. Well, the point I want to put is—that under this Bill you are going to try a number of prisoners summarily, who, under the general law, would be tried in a Superior Court. Now, before a trial in a Superior Court there would be a preliminary examination before a magistrate, and a cross-examination by the prisoner's representative. Well, now, Mr. Courtney, I have sat in a Court myself and taken a good many of these depositions, and I have noticed one thing, that the deposition as set out by the witness upon his examination in chief is one thing; but the deposition when it finally took shape after cross-examination by the prisoner's solicitor, and after re-examination, was entirely a different thing. Well, now you say that the deposition would be handed to the accused. What deposition? A deposition without cross-examination? What is cross-examination for? Why, I have known 20 cases where, by cross-examination, most valuable hints have been given to the prisoner for use at the trial. But here is a man not going to have two chances—he is going to have only one chance. He is to be tried before two magistrates, perhaps not very much to be depended upon for justice to him. He is to be tried before them, and he is to be confronted by witnesses whom he has never before had the opportunity of cross-examining, and from whom therefore he could not get the valuable hints which he might have used at his trial. He is therefore to be worse off than under the ordinary law. Is the hon. and learned Attorney General for England going to make these men worse off? That is not fair. I will make a suggestion to the Government. I hope that they will in some degree accept the Amendment proposed. I want to get this Bill out of the way. I am not an Irish Member; I am an English Member, and I am utterly sick of this Bill, and of the Government which is proposing it. I do not know whether they have noticed it or not, but I have never taken the trouble to come and oppose them. I want them to get their Bill, and use it from my point of view. I am not opposing them now, but I suggest that they should put these people in the same position that they would be in if they were going to be tried in a Superior Court. For that purpose they might give them the right to see and cross-examine the witnesses before the trial, so that they might get the same valuable hints for their guidance which they would under the ordinary law. My suggestion is, that they should take the Amendment, and, after the word "charge," should insert the words "where the case is to be dealt with summarily." Limit the Amendment to that. Then I would alter the 10 days. I think my hon. and learned Friend would admit that it is not possible in all cases to keep to that. The prosecution might get important evidence three days before the trial, and would be precluded from bringing it in, or else would have to adjourn the trial, and would suggest that he limits the number of days to three. I would ask the hon. and learned Attorney General if in England that would not be reckoned a fair thing? If so, I beg him, as an Englishman, proud of English Law, to do the same thing in Ireland. I beg to move as an Amendment to the Amendment, the insertion of the words "where the case is to be dealt with summarily," after the word "charge." If that is carried, I will move to strike out "ten," and insert "three."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, after the word "charge," to insert the words "where the case is to be dealt with summarily."
—(Mr. Storey.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted in the proposed Amendment."

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): This Amendment is exceedingly important, Mr. Courtney. In the important speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey), he almost understated the strength of our case, and has not yet fully appreciated the injustice which is to be done. He seemed to think the only injustice to be done to the prisoner would be that he would be denied the opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses before his trial. But that is not at all what is complained of. What we complain of is this, that under the action of this clause, in a case where a prisoner would be tried before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and who would otherwise be brought before a Judge and a jury under an indictment, he would be brought face to face in Court with the witnesses, and would have no opportunity of knowing what evidence they were going to give at all. Not only would he have no opportunity of cross-examining them and altering their depositions, but he would not know until they were produced what the class of evidence was—he would not have the least inkling or idea of it. That is a much stronger case than even the hon.

Member for Sunderland has submitted. And not only is that the case, but the prisoner would, by the operation of these clauses, be deprived at one and the same time of the protection of a jury, and also of certain rights which he would have had if he was going before a jury. He would not only be committed to the tender mercies of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, but he would be handed over deprived of certain facilities for defence which he would have had before a jury. A stronger case of injustice cannot possibly be made out. What we cannot understand is, what is the motive of the Government in refusing an Amendment of this kind? Do they want it to go farther than that in these cases of summary jurisdiction? So great is their greed to get convictions that they will not allow a man the common ordinary means of defence. Do they not know perfectly well that in many cases a poor man may not be able to get the assistance of counsel? I am not at all sure that even another and more serious disability will not be placed on them. We know that in the case of some of these poor people it is the custom of the Judge to rule that they shall have assigned to them professional assistance at the expense of the Crown, where they cannot themselves pay for it. So far as we have gone in the Bill, we do not know but what the prisoner is to be handed over to this Court deprived of the protection of a jury, deprived of the knowledge he would have before a jury of the character of the evidence against him, and deprived also, if a poor man, of the assistance which it is the universal custom of Criminal Courts to afford to poor men brought for trial. I want to ask, is the attitude of the Government in this a fair and reasonable one? What do they want to do? Do they want to convict innocent or guilty men? If they do not want to convict innocent men, why do they deny us a simple, reasonable, and unobjectionable means of placing men in the same position and giving them the same advantages to get up their defence that they would have if the ordinary course of law had been followed? Now, Sir, I wish to point out also that here we have been for nearly an hour debating a most important Amendment, and during the whole course of that hour not one single attempt at an argument has been used from the Benches opposite to show why the Amendment should not be adopted. We have heard the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland getting up and making a most preposterous sneer at the legal knowledge of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Elgin and Nairn, who moved the Amendment, and who knows just as much of the law as the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland; but such a line of conduct, according to my experience, invariably and inevitably leads to waste of time, because where one side think that an Amendment is important, and the Government treat their arguments with absolute contempt, and do not even take the trouble of endeavouring to reply to them, it is not to be wondered at that supporters of the Amendment should try whether they cannot compel some concession.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn): I wish only to say, Mr. Courtney, that I hope the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) will not press his Amendment, for I think it would spoil the effect of my Amendment, the purpose of which is most important, not only with regard to summary convictions, but also with regard to trials.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I see the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) on the pounce; but I think it would be unfit to have this discussion closed by the clôtüre, though the right hon. Gentleman looks like it. We have had from the Government, I may say, not one single word of argument in this discussion; but I do think, with regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey), that we are entitled to some answer. I will say no more than that; and if the Government like they can now move the clôtüre.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyronne, Mid): I think, Mr. Courtney, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland would have the effect of injuring the original Amendment; because, while the original Amendment, as it stands, applies not only to cases of summary jurisdiction, but to cases for trial at the Assizes and at the Quarter Sessions as well, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland would confine the protection proposed to be afforded to cases of summary jurisdiction alone. Now, Sir, I think it is quite necessary to protect persons who are returned for trial at the Assizes from having witnesses brought up against them at the trial without previous notice. Therefore, Sir, I would respectfully suggest to my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland that he would allow the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson) to go as it stands, and to be decided on its merits; and I hope, Sir, that even now, after this discussion, the Government will see their way to accept the reasonableness of that Amendment, which is really brought forward for the purpose of providing that persons shall not have evidence which has been taken in secret produced against them without any previous notice. I am sure the hon. and learned Attorney General for England would not think of tolerating any injustice of that kind in this country; and that being so, why should he allow the possibility of its being carried on in Ireland? The hon. and learned Attorney General should come to our protection in this case, and save us from the cock-sparrow intellect of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland.

MR. STOREY: I moved my Amendment, Mr. Courtney, for this reason. The hon. and learned Attorney General assured us that in all cases sent for trial the prisoner, or his representatives, would have the opportunity of seeing the witnesses beforehand. I therefore proposed my Amendment limiting the original Amendment to cases dealt with summarily. Of course, the hon. and learned Attorney General cannot deny it, or he would have done so, but in these cases the prisoner who, under the ordinary law, would have a chance of seeing the depositions beforehand, will not have such an opportunity. Under this new summary jurisdiction he will not have the chance of examining the witnesses beforehand. To that proposition of mine, and to the speech I made in support of it, the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland does not do me the compliment of saying a single word. I thank him for his courtesy, and I can assure him that if that is the way in which the Government propose to treat independent Members, when once in a way they think fit to make a suggestion, there is a strange lack of the old courtesies of Parliament.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I think, Mr. Courtney, I can suggest a compromise, which I would advise my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Anderson) to accept. The hon. and learned Attorney General knows very well that, according to the Proviso of the 1st subsection of this Bill, the prisoner is entitled to a copy of the depositions when returned for trial. Does the hon. and learned Attorney General see any objection to the prisoner getting the same thing in cases of summary jurisdiction? [No reply.] I really think that the conduct of the Government is going beyond all bounds. I spoke for about 30 seconds, and asked a Question, I hope in courteous language; but the Government are absolutely silent. Under these circumstances we certainly must continue the discussion.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): The conduct of the Government makes it necessary that we should take some course of a stronger character. I therefore beg to move, Sir, that you do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Dr. Kenny.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I must appeal to hon. Members opposite. There was a distinct understanding on Friday night, when we consented to report Progress, that we should really make progress to-night.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Hear, hear! We will give you the clause to-night. We are quite agreeable.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Questions are answered in this House, but they require to be answered again and again, and again. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: No.] The fact has been that, during the course of the debate, every Question raised has been disposed of over and over again. I am aware that hon. Gentlemen oppose this Bill with all their might. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Not a bit.] But it is necessary that we should come to a decision on these questions, and we do not want to answer over and over again matters which have already been answered. We cannot accept the Amendment, and I trust that hon. Members will now be content to go to a Division.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: We are quite willing to act up to the arrangement that we entered into, in letter and spirit. We are prepared to give the Government the clause this evening. Knowing that that is to be the ultimate issue, the right hon. Gentleman knows that we are as much interested as he is in bringing the debate to as early a close as possible. It is no pleasure to us to sit up till 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning. The reason we insist in worrying the Government with this Amendment, is that we think we have a substantial grievance, and we make a demand for a reasonable compromise upon it. The right hon. Gentleman has not been so much in the Committee as I have, and I quite agree with him, that one of the points raised has been discussed before; that in my remarks I altogether excluded any reference to the point already discussed—and raised an entirely new point. Will the hon. and learned Attorney General consent to apply to cases which are to be tried summarily the same privilege of a deposition which has been given in cases to be tried before a superior Court?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): It is impossible that we should make this concession in the matter of summary convictions, and for the reason that it is entirely foreign to the law of both England and Ireland. The reason why the concession was made with regard to trials by jury was that there would be a hearing before committal, and it was thought right that the previous statements made by the witnesses should be in the hands of those who defended as well as those who prosecuted at the trial, in order, that if those witnesses went back from the statements they had made, counsel would have an opportunity of cross-examining them. That has no application, however, and is entirely foreign to cases of summary conviction.

MR. ANDERSON: No reason has been given by the hon. and learned Attorney General for opposing this Amendment. He talks about something being entirely foreign to summary jurisdiction, but he forgets that the Government are introducing a foreign inquisition. [Cries of "Divide!"] You may call out

[Eighth Night.]

"Divide," but I shall continue this discussion—

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question now before the Committee is the Question of reporting Progress.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I would suggest to my hon. Friend (Dr. Kenny) that he should withdraw the Motion to report Progress, so that we can continue the discussion.

DR. KENNY: I beg leave to withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn): I will not detain the Committee long, but I must say that it is irritating to be told that we have been occupying time about a frivolous Amendment. The hon. and learned Attorney General tells us that we are introducing into this discussion a foreign question. Well, I protest, and I hope we shall all protest to the last against the introduction of the foreign and hateful provisions of this clause.

Question, "That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

Question put,

"That the words, 'In case of its being intended to call any witness examined under this section in support of a criminal charge, notice thereof shall be given to the accused ten days before the trial or hearing. The accused, by himself or his solicitor, shall be entitled to see and examine such witness, and for this purpose shall be entitled to call for the production of such witness at any time and place in the proclaimed district, be there added.'"—(Mr. Anderson.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 124; Noes 219: Majority 95.—(Div. List, No. 146.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I do not know whether the Government have any objection to the next Amendment that stands in my name. I beg to move it. This is obstruction.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at end, add—"Depositions taken under this section may be used at any time during the trial of an accused person by the accused or his advisers for the purpose of cross-examination or comment upon discrepancies or contradictions, and whether such cross-examination or comment relate to the evidence of a witness examined at such inquiry, or otherwise."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

Mr. Anderson

MR. HOLMES refused to accept the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to move the next Amendment standing in my name—namely, to add at end of page 2—

"The provisions of the Magistrates Protection Act shall not apply to any magistrate exercising powers under this section."

The Government have been telling us all along that if the magistrates act out of their jurisdiction, or improperly, an action can always lie against them. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) has waxed eloquent upon the actions that may be brought against magistrates if they act improperly, or out of their jurisdiction. Now, I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the provisions of the Magistrates' Protection Act. The measure was passed in 1849, in rather a dark period of British law in regard to criminal matters. The 1st section of the Act provides that any action against a magistrate must be brought as a test. That is a beautiful provision. And then you must allege that the act of the magistrate of which you complain was done maliciously and without reasonable cause. I should like to put the matter to the hon. and learned Attorney General for England, who certainly—without any disrespect to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland—whose ability and courtesy I am glad to acknowledge—has shown us great courtesy. I would ask him how he would like to appear in an action in which it would have to be shown that the act was done maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause? It is an absurdity to throw on a man the necessity of proving that. It could not be proved. Nobody could show malice on the part of the magistrate, and nobody could show that his act was done without reasonable and proper cause. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland will soon be in the Queen's Bench, and what an amusing thing it would be for me to argue before him that Captain Plunkett had done a thing without reasonable or probable cause. Why, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would sling his wig at me at such an extravagant proposition. He would assume—as a matter of law—that every magistrate did act with reasonable and proper cause. Another section of the Act provides that the proceedings shall not be taken in respect of a conviction, or order, until after the conviction or order has been quashed. Then the action must be started within six months, and notice of the action must be given within one month. I do not see why this Magistrates' Protection Act, which is 38 years old, should apply. As the Government have been going on all along on the pretence that a person who has been wronged will have his action, and as they have provided to have the question which the witness refuses to answer stated in the warrant, it seems to me that the whole question of whether the magistrate has done an illegal act or not might fairly be allowed to go to the jury. I do trust that, under the circumstances, the Government will say that the Magistrates' Protection Act shall not apply. As all the men who will be committed under this section will probably be very poor, I hope the Government will see their way to denude the magistrates of this unfair protection, which was created before such legislation as that now before us was ever dreamt of. English Members must remember that the cost of defending these actions will be paid by the State. It is not like an ordinary case, where the defendant has to defray the cost out of his own pocket. If an action is brought against a magistrate or the police in Ireland, the Government pay for it. Seeing, therefore, that the Government have the purse of the British Treasury at their disposal, and that the magistrates practically cannot suffer for any tortious act they may commit, I think that something like fair play should be granted to those who claim that they have been unjustly treated. I hope that the Government will see their way to accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at end, to add—"The provisions of the Magistrates' Protection Act shall not apply to any magistrate exercising powers under this section."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I have listened with great attention to the arguments of the hon. and learned

Member (Mr. T. M. Healy), and I am willing, I am sure, to follow the example of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes), and to answer any arguments that are put before me. I cannot admit, however, that the hon. and learned Member has given any reason why an exception should be made in this case. I am sure it was quite unintentional on the hon. and learned Member's part, but I do not think he has quite clearly brought before the House the distinction between the two cases to which he has referred. If the magistrate has exercised his discretion in a perfectly bond fide way, acting, at the same time, within his jurisdiction, the Act provides that he shall not be held liable. If he has made a mistake, malice has to be proved against him. If, however, the magistrate has acted beyond his jurisdiction, no such allegation as that of reasonable and probable cause is necessary. This was not an Act passed for the first time in what the hon. and learned Member calls the dark ages of the Criminal Law. It was a measure amending a series of Acts, which went as far back as 10 Charles I., and 43 Geo. III., whereby protection was given to the magistrates. The Act has been on the Statute Book since 1849, and a similar Act in regard to England has been on the Statute Book since 1848. I need not remind the hon. and learned Member that there has been a series of Coercion Acts in which the jurisdiction of magistrates has been extended. I do not think the hon. and learned Gentleman is able to produce a single case in which injustice has been done by a magistrate acting maliciously, or outside his jurisdiction, and there has been a failure to get damages or justice. If the hon. and learned Member can show us any case in respect of which there is a reason why magistrates acting bond fide should be made liable, and why magistrates exceeding their jurisdiction should not be subjected to the same liability as under the existing law, I shall be glad to hear it. But I think that no such case has been, or can be, produced. I do not see why we should make any alteration in the law in the manner proposed.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I am afraid that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Richard

Webster) has not quite accurately grasped the position in which the Amendment places the clause in the face of the existing law. Now, as regards either condition of magistrates—he, on the one hand, who acts within his jurisdiction, and he, on the other hand, who acts without his jurisdiction—which comes under the influence of the Justices' Protection Act, I think I can show that the Government have either not understood the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. T. M. Healy), or they have blindly taken an altogether and totally wrong view of the matter. As regards the first section of the Act, I may point out to right hon. Gentlemen opposite that the bulk of the Representatives from Ireland has kept urging the Government that the section should be administered by trained lawyers only, and not by every person incapable and partially capable who might have the good fortune to get appointed. When trained lawyers are appointed, it will be quite obvious to the Government that these gentlemen will be able, because they know the law, to act within their jurisdiction, and thus a great number of what might turn out to be very serious mistakes indeed, committed by incompetent persons, would be altogether avoided. It is my opinion that when the Government can take upon themselves the serious responsibility of giving the enormous powers under this section to a body of untrained men, the Government ought to be prepared to provide that, at the very least, the men who accept the powers should take the consequences of their own ignorance. Hon. Members on this side of the House have kept asking the Government that the men upon whom this authority is to devolve should be lawyers, and they have proposed Amendment after Amendment in that direction without apparent effect. But the Government have thought fit to take another view than that the enormous and tremendous machinery of this clause should not be exercised except by some persons who were acquainted in a skilled manner with the law, and they have steadily refused all our Amendments designed to destroy this evil-bearing blot. The Government see perfectly well the liabilities of the risks which will be run, the clause passing in its present shape, in the working of the machinery of the new law, and yet they have assurance enough to coolly tell us now that, notwithstanding those adverse facts, they are quite prepared and willing to protect the incapable inquisitors, so long as they are such, whether they distinguish themselves by making mistakes or not. When a man suffers imprisonment through the incompetency of some of these darlings of the Government, it will be comical consolation to him to be told that the Government consider the erring magistrate has acted within his jurisdiction, because, practically, the ignoring of the error amounts to that. I must repeat most strongly that it is a monstrous thing that the Government should get up and tell this House and the country, that if the captains and colonels of Militia, and other persons of that character, in Ireland, who happen to be the agents of the Government for administering coercion commit serious and far-reaching errors of judgment under the plain law, by reason of their incompetency, and cause to be improperly imprisoned innocent persons, those errors will be hoodwinked, and the men who are guilty of them will have thrown around them the defending shield provided by this Magistrates' Protection Act, I say that this is most unfair. I would urge on the Government that if they are determined that this clause is to be worked by untrained persons—by men ignorant of the law, instead of by skilled lawyers—let us have the satisfaction of knowing that the gentlemen exercising the power will be compelled to take the consequences of their own ignorance and malpractice, and will be liable to the same consequences as other persons who make similar mistakes. It will be a most unjust thing if any person, who by the command of these magistrates, wielding their authority wrongfully and ignorantly, having been improperly imprisoned, is prevented, at any rate, from taking advantage and consolation for gross injury from whatever poor remedy he may have in an action at law. As to the second branch of the hon. and learned Attorney General's argument, I think he is somewhat incorrect in his notions as to the application of the provisions of the Magistrates' Protection Act. The Government, in this case, also have committed the mistake of allowing after-evils to spring up as a result of not destroying or removing or modifying root-evils. The Government have refused the Party that sits on these Benches Amendments aiming at enabling any accused persons to go behind the warrant, in order that the true facts might be reached and taken advantage of—that is to say, as a matter of fact the Government will not allow any Court which has jurisdiction in these matters to go into exactly the facts and circumstances of the case and what exactly occurred. I ask hon. Gentlemen on the Government Bench, is it at all a fair thing to throw on a man, placed at enormous disadvantages, the burdens which the Magistrates' Protection Act casts upon him. First of all, the party conflicting with the incompetent administrator will have to show cause why he will have to set aside the order upon which he is committed before he can take action according to the ordinary law of the land. Any magistrate of ordinary capacity and knowledge can draw a warrant which, on the face of it, leaves him always within jurisdiction. We had an example in point, the other day in Ireland, of how abuses and friction will arise under this clause if the Government allow it to remain unaltered. In the case of the Rev. Father Keller, the Court of Bankruptcy, through Judge Boyd, committed the witness (the Rev. Father Keller) to prison for refusing to answer certain questions. Now, the Act under which the learned Judge committed the defendant for that contumacy required that no question should be put to a witness, except such questions as related to the property of the bankrupt whose case was under the consideration of the Court. If anything could be plain, it was plain, from the warrant, that the questions put to the Rev. Father Keller had no relation to the property of the bankrupt at all, but was simply a question of this character—“Whom did you meet in the town hall at Youghal on such a day?” Thus the Court decided that it would not go behind the warrant, and held that it lay on the person being questioned to show that by any possibility the question could be relevant. But then, any Court will throw on the defendant the onus of showing that the questions refused to be answered are questions which could not possibly be relevant. I need not say that it would be practically impossible in connection with a circumstance in a case like this, which is remote and preposterous, to—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must say to the hon. Member that I am unable to see the relevancy of what he is saying to the subject under debate.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Sir, I will point out how I regard what I have said as relevant. I am now arguing that under the Magistrates' Protection Act before any person can bring an action in respect of any committal to prison under this section, the warrant of imprisonment should first be set aside. Now, having regard to the form of the warrant it would be practically impossible to get any Court to do any such thing. I think, Sir, this is relevant. To me it does not appear to be at all fair that any person sent to prison under this section should be called upon first to set aside the warrant under which he has been committed, because in practice I am confidently of opinion that any such thing would be absolutely impossible. In a word, Sir, I would ask the Government seriously to consider the whole bearing of this matter. In either aspect whether on the one hand in the case where the magistrate acts within his jurisdiction, or on the other hand in the case where the magistrate acts without his jurisdiction I would contend that the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend is a fair and reasonable one. It would be quite obvious to every unbiased person, that where a magistrate exercises such enormous powers of authority as the Government propose to extend to the Irish magistrates, the shortcomings and errors and offences of those magistrates should not be palliated or defended on the plea that the offenders not being trained persons in the law, are not responsible for what they do. All we want is that these men shall be responsible for what they do. It will be for the Government to appoint capable persons, but if it should happen that serious mistakes occur, it will be decidedly monstrous that all persons concerned shall be enabled to escape responsibility for their wrongdoing.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg, Sir, to move that you do now report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. As a matter of fact, we are all more than tired, and if we do not get home we shall not be in a very fit state for our duties to-morrow. We were here to about 3 o'clock this morning, and now it is a quarter past 1. We are to meet to-morrow at 12, and as I understand the Government intend to take other Business to-night, I hope the Government will see their way to drop this debate and to allow us to proceed with the remaining Business on the Paper. If we get away by 2 o'clock this morning we will have then only 10 hours between this and the meeting of the House to-morrow, to go home, sleep, eat, and get back again. I would earnestly point out to the Government that there is no use of coercing the House of Commons after the manner in which Ireland is coerced.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I must say to the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) at once that the Government cannot assent to the proposal to report Progress. There is an understanding that this clause shall be disposed of to-night, and I hope that there will be little longer delay in bringing the discussion to an end. As to the few remaining Amendments, we will strive to get through them as quickly as possible; and I ask hon. Gentleman below the Gangway to assist us in that purpose.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I said early in the evening that, so far as I was concerned, I was quite willing to go on with these Amendments.

Dr. CLARK: Sir, I see that there are about seven Amendments, and it is the most likely thing in the world that we may be here until 3 or 4 o'clock to-morrow morning in discussing them. [Ministerial cheers.] Perhaps hon. Gentlemen desire to remain here through the night. I have no objection to remain myself, but besides the hon. Members it must be recollected that there are the servants and officers on duty to be considered. If you want to get this clause done with, I think that hon. Members from Ireland might very well withdraw such Amendments as have small chance of acceptance from an unwilling Government. If the House has come to an understanding about finishing this clause, what on earth is the use of wasting time in talking about it—the one side trying to convince the other of something of which they will not be convinced. I hope that hon. Members will see their way, either to go home at something like an early hour, or to cease talking about a matter which has already been decided.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member for Caithness withdraw his Motion to report Progress?

Dr. CLARK: Yes.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I have been in the habit of sitting here and moving Amendments for years, without cheers from either Party in the House; and I intend, so long as I remain in the House, to do my duty to those whom I represent, irrespective of the opinion of anybody above, below, behind, or alongside of the Gangway. I feel considerable sympathy with the officers of the House on duty, and especially with you, Sir (Mr. Courtney), who always do your work satisfactorily and fairly. In order that the clause may be got through speedily, perhaps the Government will be willing to do something of the nature of a compromise. Mr. Courtney, perhaps you will allow me to say that, simply out of deference to yourself and the officers of the House, that I would be quite willing to agree with any reasonable suggestion from the Government which will be anything of the character of a settlement in regard to the remaining Amendments on this clause.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): As to the few remaining Amendments, there are some to which the Government, of course, cannot assent. As to No. 130, the House will not take that. It will be recollected that we promised some modification of it.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: You did not say a word about that before.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Then I think Nos. 127, 128, 129, 130 may go.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I put it to the Government, if that is a reasonable way of meeting hon. Members on these Benches? You may talk about Obstruction so long as you like; but I, for my part, have never spoken a word since this Committee commenced which could be construed into Obstruction. Now, however, I will withdraw the Amendment under the consideration of the House, and proceed to discuss my next Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at end, to add—"At the trial of any accused person, the Crown shall, if required by the accused, produce, for cross-examination, every person examined at any inquiry under this section in the same way as they are now bound to produce for examination by the accused all witnesses examined before a Grand Jury."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. T. M. HEALY: The inquiry under the Act is meant to be serious or not serious. Any inquiry, to be efficient, must be substantial, accurate, painstaking, and close; and every witness to the inquiry should have something to say which would throw light, in some way, upon the subject under investigation. The Government cannot think it likely that, if I was defending a prisoner, I would ask to have produced at the trial any witness who had not said anything in his depositions which would entitle him to be called by me in Court. The witness's name would be on the top of the indictment, and the Crown would have to produce him. The Government would put the accused to the trouble of calling and paying for witnesses, whether they were needful or not. The Treasury does not advance money for the payment or producing of witnesses. Thus, in the case of the Maamtrasna trials, the Crown compelled the accused to bring up their witnesses. I will be willing to compromise with the Government, by suggesting that the clause should apply to cases where 10 days' notice have been given. I make a rule not to speak on anybody else's Amendments, because I think I talk long enough on my own; but I expect to be fairly met when I make a fair offer. I cannot be accused of obstructing, because I do not talk till I know what I am talking about. Under all the circumstances, I would ask the Government to accede to my Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I do not think that there is any great—if any at all—necessity for the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford. The ordinary procedure meets every difficulty. I think, indeed, that there are many cases in which the witness's answer to any question put with the view of detecting a crime would be that he know nothing whatever about the matter. I certainly am of opinion that it would be very hard on the taxpayers of the country, and on the witnesses themselves, if all the witnesses should be brought forward at large expense to the public, and detained upon the chance of the prisoner's counsel calling them. The Crown know the witnesses they rely on, and they accordingly put them on the back of their bill, and I think that it is not too much to presume that the prisoner's counsel should know the witnesses upon which his case relies. There is certainly no need of the Amendment, and it is not of such a sort that the Government can entertain it.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I am afraid, Sir, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland scarcely speaks with accuracy in this matter. There is one thing which is keenly impressed on the minds of witnesses in the process of taking depositions, and that is that everything said or urged on behalf of the prisoner shall go into the depositions and be sent forward, so that they shall be available for the prisoner as well as for the Crown. Some of these are not in favour of the Crown at all, but strongly in favour of the prisoner, and this very fact is one of the brightest parts of the criminal procedure in Ireland, and is strongly upborne by the Judges. Now, here is a case in exact analogy, as I think, although the right hon. and learned Gentleman cannot see the analogy. You have obtained by private inquiry certain information, and the prisoner, or his counsel or solicitor, discovers that this information would be rather favourable to the prisoner's case, and surely if he gives a few days' notice that he will require the attendance of certain persons at the trial, it is not too much to ask that they shall be in attendance. Then the right hon. and learned Gentleman brings in his appeal on behalf of the British taxpayer. But during the whole time the right hon. and learned Gentleman has been practising at the Bar the British taxpayer has been paying for the attendance of witnesses for the defence at trials, and justice has been administered fairly well upon that plan. Altogether, I think it must be admitted the Amendment is consonant with what has been the practice, and might well be accepted.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It is a little saddening to think that the right hon. and learned Attorney General has given so little consideration to this matter. He has dealt with the Amendment all along as if these witnesses were to be brought up at Assizes; but the Government have abandoned that altogether, they will try all these people by summary jurisdiction. At Assizes we know the Government are bound to give notice of the witnesses they will produce to support their indictment, but here there will be no indictment, and the Government can bring up anybody, and are we to be told that the Government will only bring up their own men, throwing upon the unfortunate accused the expense of bringing up the other material witnesses? The Government talk as if these cases are to be tried at Assizes, but however difficult it may be to reach Tory understanding, I should have thought my Amendment was clear when I added at the end of it—

"In the same way as they are now bound to produce for examination by the accused all witnesses examined before a Grand Jury."

This clearly points to my view that the Government will not treat these cases as matters for indictment at all, but will proceed by summary jurisdiction. Now, I will not appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland—"He giveth his beloved sleep"—but I will ask the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland to remember that this is an Amendment dealing with summary jurisdiction. If this were a case dealt with as an indictable offence, you would be compelled to bring up every man who made a deposition; but here you wish to make a choice of the men selecting your own witnesses, and throwing upon the prisoner the duty never cast on him hitherto of bringing up a number of persons who in the case of an indictable offence he would not be bound to bring up at all. I suppose you will only take depositions. I presume so—though I seek enlightenment on this point—I presume you will not make formal depositions in any case where there is going to be summary jurisdiction? That being so, you will use quo ad summary trials all the depositions taken at the private inquiry, and you put the accused in a position of disadvantage he would not be in if it were a trial by jury. I put it to the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland as a reasonable man, can he not really see his way to make this concession in common fairness? He must see it is a substantial point, and that it is a totally different thing from a trial at Assizes.

MR. HOLMES: I can assure hon. Members we have given this Amendment consideration, and that we have no foregone intention to refuse concessions; but, as I have said, this Amendment would be introducing an altogether anomalous procedure, and I do not see the analogy that hon. Members have sought to establish. It is only in the case of indictment that the Crown is required to produce witnesses. In cases of summary jurisdiction the Crown produces persons to give the necessary evidence, and, on the other hand, the evidence necessary for the defence is produced by the accused; and I do not see that the preliminary inquiry can affect that position.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): A most discreditable fact in connection with the administration of the Criminal Law in Ireland is the way in which the Crown Officials habitually treat persons required by prisoners to be produced as witnesses. It is the duty of the Crown to pay the expenses of prisoner's witnesses; but the Crown Officials delay to pay the witnesses anything until the trial is over, and sometimes the Assizes last for weeks. I have known an Assize to last for nearly a month. During the whole of this time the Crown keeps the witnesses hanging about the Court, not fixing any time for the trial, not giving any information as to the time within which the trial has no chance of coming on, and compelling the prisoner to advance the expenses of his witnesses during the whole of the time. The object of the Amendment is that where the Crown exercises power under this section, and holds an inquiry for the purpose of getting evidence, and having done that supplies depositions, that it shall be the duty of the Crown to produce at the trial any of the witnesses the prisoner shall call on them to produce. Is there anything unreasonable in that? Let us consider the matter. The Crown has at its disposal the funds of the State, and is unfettered by the want of pecuniary resources; but the unfortunate man under accusation will be in many cases absolutely penniless, and to put upon him the task of keeping witnesses hanging around the Court until they are required, is to impose a burden for which he is quite unequal. I respectfully submit it is not a fair proceeding. I have known cases in which a prisoner's witnesses have had to go to the poor-house night after night while waiting for a case to come on, they not having the means to support themselves meanwhile in the Assize town. Surely it would be a grave scandal to have that sort of thing taking place under this section. The right hon. and learned Attorney General says it would be unreasonable to put on the Crown the duty of bringing up to Petty Sessions, Quarter Sessions, or Assizes, as the case may be, witnesses there is no intention of examining; and, following his usual practice, he gave an illustration, but about as improbable a case as could be imagined. He imagines a case in which the Crown makes an experimental inquiry, and under this drag-net procedure summonses a number of witnesses to the inquiry. It may happen, he says, that a number of witnesses may reply that they know nothing about the circumstances upon which they are questioned, and that it would be hard to compel the Crown to produce such persons as witnesses at the trial. But I may ask what object would a prisoner have in asking the Crown to produce such witnesses? The prisoner will be supplied with a copy of the depositions, and is it conceivable, after he has had that copy, that he will require the attendance of a number of persons whose appearance would be of no value to support his case? With all respect, I cannot but say the reply of the right hon. and learned Attorney General is likely to mislead the Committee. Is it not only fair, that if the Crown chooses to examine witnesses under the powers of this section, that they should, at any rate, produce these witnesses for cross-examination, if the prisoner's defence requires that?—

[Interruptions.]

MR. T. M. HEALY: The understanding was that the Government should endeavour to keep their Followers behind them quiet. The hon. Member for South Kensington (Sir Algernon Borthwick) and others near him are somewhat demonstrative, and I fear we shall be forced to make a Motion which, for my own part, I should be reluctant to do. The Government do not seem to have grasped the importance of this Amendment. I have known prisoners compelled to plead guilty, simply because they were unable to keep their witnesses hanging about the Court waiting for the trial for days. I have known this, and Judges have known it. The Crown have nothing like law and order in their arrangements for the trials of prisoners; a man never knows when the case in which he is concerned will come on. I saw myself, during Cork Assizes in 1880, 300 witnesses waiting about the Court, not one of them knowing when he would be wanted. All these 300 persons were detained at the expense of the prisoners, and many of them were compelled to go to the poor-house for shelter and food, because prisoners were unable to support them. I have known an Assize to last a month, with an adjournment over Christmas, and witnesses having to go to the poor-house for their Christmas dinner. Even before the trial was reached, after weeks of delay, I have known witnesses compelled to go away, something at their farm or home requiring them to return, and prisoners have had to plead guilty. I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland knows nothing about this, nor can it be expected that the hon. and learned Attorney General for England has the knowledge, and I am quite sure the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury is a blank on the subject, but to the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland I would say he really should not—when he gets a conviction, as he will, from his Resident Magistrates in these matters—he really should not inflict this fine, in addition to the conviction, on the unfortunate prisoner, by compelling him to keep his witnesses waiting. I have yet to learn if the witnesses are to be paid by the Crown. Is it likely that a prisoner would call witnesses who would be of no use to him? If the Government fear that, surely they can meet that by words requiring 10 days' notice to be given. I am willing to accept that Amendment of my Amendment. But to say, when you can gather to the Winter Assizes at Cork from that county, from Limerick, and Kerry witnesses by the hundred, poor, wretched, spiritless creatures, who hang round the Court, some of them smelling of their poverty, when you have collected them and driven them to the poor-house for shelter, keeping them waiting in uncertainty because you will not take the cases in alphabetical or any other order, then I say, under such circumstances, it is only reasonable that we should press upon the attention of the Government the justice of requiring that the Crown shall pay the expenses of witnesses in any case where the attendance of such is required by the prisoner for his defence. Let the Crown proceed to recover afterwards if a witness is not called, and it is shown that the expense incurred was wholly unnecessary.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I only wish to make a suggestion which might be considered reasonable. Let a list be supplied to the accused of all the witnesses examined before the secret investigation, and from that list let the accused have the right to impose on the Crown the duty of producing at the trial those persons whose evidence is required. That, I think, would meet the object my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. T. M. Healy) desires to attain. I am disposed to think that the Amendment, as it stands, is rather sweeping, because it might involve the bringing up of a whole country side because they were summoned to a secret investigation. Something in the nature of the provision I describe would, I think, meet the case where a prisoner is unable to provide for his witnesses.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I think that an unanswerable case has been made out for the Amendment. I am not a lawyer, and have nothing to do with legal procedure; but I am familiar with the state of things in an Assize town which has been described, and I know, from experience as a workhouse officer, that the people summoned as witnesses have sought shelter in the workhouse. You have in the latter part of the Bill a clause for changing the venue. Does not the hon. and learned Attorney General consider it a fair thing, under this clause, this very oppressive clause, not inaptly called the "Star Chamber" Clause, that a number of witnesses shall be examined and evidence collected, of which the prisoner should not be allowed to avail himself, he not having the means of compelling the attendance of witnesses on his behalf? The Government are anxious to get this clause passed tonight; and would it not be wiser—more conducive to that end—to accept this small concession so cogently, so strongly urged, than to refuse and lead to unnecessary prolongation of debate? In some way, I think, the Government might promise a concession that would meet the point so strongly urged.

MR. DODDS (Stockton): I have not spoken before in this Committee, and do so now to make a suggestion that the Government might meet the object of the Amendment, if the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), instead of requiring the attendance of every person examined at the preliminary inquiry, would amend his Amendment by substituting the words after "cross-examination"—

"Such of the persons examined at the preliminary inquiry under this section as the accused person considers necessary for the purposes of his defence."

I think, with an alteration of that kind, the Government might accept the Amendment. They have pleaded the cost to the British taxpayer; but surely, when a man is accused under a new mode of procedure never heard of before in this country—surely every facility should be given him to defend himself by the attendance of witnesses. It has been pointed out how difficult it is for a prisoner to keep his witnesses in attendance owing to poverty; and, under the circumstances, I do think an accused person has a right to demand this as only justice, not from the Government, but from the British taxpayer.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I shall be happy to accept this suggestion of the hon. Member for Stockton, and I am quite ready to strike out the words after "cross-examination," and the Amendment might run—"Such persons with regard to whom notice shall have been given by the accused;" and, if you like, insert "ten days" before "notice."

MR. HOLMES: The practical effect of this would be to introduce a practice that is unknown to Irish or English law. I am not qualified to speak about Scotch law. In exceptional cases, as I have shown, the Crown is charged with the expenses of witnesses for the defence; but in this particular suggestion of the hon. Member, the Crown is to pay for all witnesses of the prisoner at the Court of Summary Jurisdiction, as well as at Assizes and Quarter Sessions.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. DODDS: No; my suggestion was that the Crown should produce in examination before Resident Magistrates, such of the persons who had been examined in the preliminary inquiry as the prisoner, or his counsel, think necessary for the defence. To pursue, in fact, in this examination the same course as would be followed had an indictment been brought, except in that case the names of the witnesses would be on the back of the indictment.

MR. HOLMES: These are the witnesses upon whom the Crown relies to support the indictment. But in cases of summary jurisdiction the Crown does not produce the witnesses for the defence. How can you refuse, if you grant this to make the same concession to prisoners in England?

MR. T. M. HEALY: There is no preliminary inquiry.

MR. HOLMES: The inquiry makes no difference in the world. I think the matter has now been fully discussed, and we might make another step towards reaching the end of the clause.

MR. O'HEA (Donegal, W.): I think the importance of this Amendment has been fully shown. The hon. and learned Attorney General has informed the Committee that the Crown will call those witnesses upon whom they rely. But out of 15 or 20 persons examined at the preliminary inquiry there may be only five or six examined at the trial of the accused. We know also, for experience has not been wanting, that evidence may be fabricated in Ireland by informers. The evidence relied upon by the Crown may be such as to satisfy gentlemen of the calibre and unscrupulousness of Mr. George Bolton. But there may be a number of persons called before the inquiry whose evidence is worthless to the Crown, but might be material for the defence. If a list of these witnesses were supplied to the accused, and he had reason to believe that the attendance of some of them would be material to his defence, I think he has a right to the advantage of their testimony. There are a number of defences—that of an alibi, would, I suppose, be a very common one—in regard to which the evidence of such persons might be material, and the Amendment appears to me a most reasonable one.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The argument of the hon. and learned Attorney General, that the same practice might be demanded in England, is wholly beside the question, for in England it is not the Crown usually that prosecutes, it is an individual; except in a very few cases in England the Crown does not take up the prosecution, while in Ireland it is usually the Queen who is the prosecutor. There is no argument to be founded on the procedure in the two countries. I shall certainly press my Amendment.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I fail to see why this reasonable Amendment should be refused. It is bad enough to deprive the Irish people of trial by jury, without depriving them of the right they undoubtedly would possess if they went before a jury upon indictment. It is vain to attempt to draw the parallel between England and Ireland in reference to the law it is proposed to establish in Ireland. If you are going to send men before two Stipendiary Magistrates, depriving them of the right of trial by a jury of their fellow-countrymen, it is only right that they should have the means of producing the witnesses in the one case as in the other, that their case may be properly investigated. On the ground of unnecessary expense, I see no objection to the Amendment, because my hon. Friend has agreed to accept an Amendment by which the Crown shall receive 10 days' notice of the witnesses the accused proposes to call, and the Crown could object to any if they were unnecessary. The reasonable character of the Amendment has been brought out by the discussion we have had, limited as it has been by the conspiracy of silence on the Government Bench, of which evidence has been given on so many former occasions.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 86; Noes 191: Majority 105.—(Div. List, No. 147.)

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at end, add—"There shall be laid before Parliament, at the beginning of every Session, a Return showing the number of inquiries held since the preceding Session, the number of summonses issued, the number of witnesses examined, the names of, and the sentences on, the persons committed for contempt, and the result, if any, of each inquiry."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

[Eighth Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I dare say I shall save the time of the House if I now say the Government are prepared, in accordance with their pledge given the other night, to accept words to this effect—

“That there shall be published quarterly in The Dublin Gazette a Return showing the number of inquiries held during the preceding quarter, the hours during which such inquiries were held, the number of summonses issued, the number of witnesses examined, and the names and calling of persons committed for contempt of Court.”

MR. T. M. HEALY: There is one point omitted. I should like the Return to indicate the number of days each inquiry occupied.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: Very well; that shall be added.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): Will the hon. and learned Gentleman also give the names of persons committed for contempt and who are still detained in prison at the end of each quarter?

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: Certainly. The Return will give the names of the persons committed, and the sentences imposed on them.

MR. MURPHY: But there may be cases in which no sentence has been passed, and where after mere detention the persons may have been released. The object of my suggestion is to enable it to be seen who are actually in prison at the time of the publication of the Return.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: The information will be included in the Return.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Sir Richard Webster) agreed to.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I am happy to say we are getting to the end of the Amendments on this clause. I beg to move, as an Amendment, the addition of a Proviso at the end of the clause. This Proviso is, I may explain, intended to provide against the depositions at the private inquiry being modified and contracted before production in open Court. I need hardly point out that the original notes would certainly be better evidence than a résumé of the witness's examination drawn out by a Resident Magistrate.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at end, add—“The original shorthand notes of the shorthand writer shall be preserved in the office of the Clerk of the Crown for the county in which such inquiry as aforesaid shall be held, and so much thereof as relates to the examination of a witness shall be annexed to the deposition or depositions of such witness, and in all legal proceedings, civil or criminal, be produced therewith, and may be used in such proceeding to contradict or modify the statements made in such deposition or depositions, or to discredit the same.”

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I ought briefly to explain our objection to this proposal. It is already practically provided that the witness's statement shall be taken down by the Resident Magistrate, and afterwards read over to the witness and signed by him. When we consented that shorthand notes should be taken, a discussion turned on whether the word should be deposition or statement, and we propose to restore the word deposition. There is no objection that the shorthand writer's note should be attached to the deposition on every occasion on which it is brought into Court, and the Government will take the best means of providing that this shall be done. But I submit that if these words are introduced into this clause it will lead to confusion between depositions and statements.

MR. CHANCE: On the understanding that my object shall be otherwise attained I will withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

New Amendment proposed.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): In the original sub-section it is provided that the witness shall be brought up to the inquiry by process solely confined to indictable offences. I pointed that out to the Law Officers, and they agreed that the enactment relating to ordinary summary offences should also be included. Accordingly, we altered the words as follows:—

“The enactment of the Petty Sessions Act concerning matters of information for indictable offences, or concerning matters for summary conviction, shall apply for the purposes of the section.”

That arrangement was made because we pointed out that if the summary process alone were used, it would operate very harshly. But there was another difficulty—that an offence punishable as a summary offence may also be tried by indictment, and, therefore, the Resident Magistrate at an inquiry might use whatever machinery he pleased. I would, therefore, propose an Amendment to the effect that the Attorney General, on being informed of the nature of the offence, shall inquire in the direction pointed out in these words whether it shall be tried summarily or by indictment, and he shall indicate the same to the Resident Magistrate, and show him what machinery he shall apply in bringing witnesses before him.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I do not think the point as to this can be settled until the remaining clauses have been gone through. It does not seem at present possible to accept the Amendment in the form which the hon. Member proposes. Suppose, for instance, there was an offence committed, say, the houghing of cattle, there might be some minor offences involved, and we cannot tell beforehand what it may be necessary to do in such a case. I am quite willing to undertake to consider the suggestion of the hon. Member.

MR. CHANCE: I would like to point out that before an inquiry can be held there must be a sworn information that an offence has been committed. Therefore, before the Attorney General can set the clause in motion, he must know precisely the technical description of the alleged offence. I do not see that his observations are very much to the point.

MR. O'DOHERTY: I am satisfied that, having called the attention of the Law Officers to the matter, they will make it all right on Report. I will, therefore, withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

New Amendment proposed.

MR. CHANCE: I think this is only reasonable. The Crown possesses enormous powers, and, they having obtained their evidence, I do not see why the whole of it should not be available for the trial.

THE CHAIRMAN: If it is intended simply for the information of the accused, then it is already provided for in the Proviso at the end of the sub-section, which requires that, in the event of any person being accused of crime, copies of the depositions taken in the inquiry shall be sent to him.

MR. CHANCE: On a point of Order, Sir, Amendment 127, which has practically been passed, refers to the trial of an accused person before a Court and jury. My present Amendment deals also with the proceedings before a magistrate. In addition, it will be necessary to produce the witnesses to the Grand Jury; under Amendment 127 it is not necessary to do so.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment is one which cannot now be taken, inasmuch as another practically applying to both cases has been rejected. The Committee has already decided the question of principle thus raised.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Now, Mr. Courtney, the hour has arrived when I think we may give the clause a parting kick, as the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) said of the Land Bill. That the discussion of the clause has not been profitless is shown by the result that, whereas, as originally drawn, it contained only 33 lines, it now consists of 110 lines, irrespective of Amendments to the body of the clause, but not adding to its length. The Government have realized how rude was its structure, how crudely drawn it was. I say this, not for the purpose of casting discredit upon the Law Officers of the Government who have charge of the Bill, it only shows that they were not acquainted with facts we had collected from a careful watching of a similar clause in the Bill of the right hon. Member for Derby. The clause in that former Bill passed in one night. I remember that we, in Ireland, at the time were in ignorance of the scope of this secret inquiry clause; but it is in consequence of our observation of the manner in which it could be used that we felt obliged to move Amendments, and that we have been enabled to do so with so much success, often at very late hours of the night. If we have in some cases restricted and even abandoned our Amendments, let that not be taken in any sense—it is not so far as my Amendments are con-earned—an indication that we did not believe that a substantial point was raised; it was in deference to the convenience of the Committee, which has, barring some little ebullitions of feeling from hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite—excusable, under the circumstances, and nobody objects less to a “row” than myself—addressed itself to the discussion with considerable patience. At the same time, it is only right to say that in the discussions which have sometimes been carried to some length, and not without benefit, we have, on the whole, no complaint of the way in which we have been met by the Law Officers of England and Ireland; although we have been obliged to attack the Attorney General for Ireland, and have received much more attention and concession from the Attorney General for England. All round, I think, now that the clause is finished, we can give the parting kick in good humour.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 171; Noes 79: Majority 92.—(Div. List, No. 148.)

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [16th May] reported.

First Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution.”

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to move the adjournment of the debate. There are some very important questions that come up under the Motion for Supply, and this is too late an hour for their discussion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Debate be now adjourned.”—(Dr. Clark.)

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The Resolution which is now before the House has relation to the Army Votes, and upon these I think the hon. Gentleman has no question to raise. I would appeal to him to allow this Resolution to pass, and whatever question he desires to raise can come later.

DR. CLARK: I withdraw my Motion, so far as the Army Votes are concerned.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, and agreed to.

Second Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution.”

DR. CLARK: There were questions left over for discussion upon this Vote early yesterday morning, and I trust the Government will not refuse an opportunity for bringing them forward. I now beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Debate be now adjourned.”—(Dr. Clark.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I hope the hon. Member will not persevere with this Motion. We must resist it, and if, instead of occupying time in a Division, the hon. Member will bring forward the questions he desires to raise, we are quite ready to answer them forthwith.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): I think it is highly inconvenient to discuss questions relating to large expenditure at this hour of the morning.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 105: Majority 47.—(Div. List No. 149.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM: I beg, Sir, to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member cannot do that.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to second that.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House do now adjourn.”—(Mr. Cox.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I must, Sir, appeal to hon. Members to have regard to the necessities of Supply. It is, of course, quite open to them to do as they are doing; but I would point out that we are prepared to answer any questions they may put relative to these Votes. These Motions are not creditable to hon. Members. If it is desired by hon.

Gentlemen to go home, and if it is desired that you, Sir, and the officers of the House shall have the rest which I am sure the Government admit you need, that object can best be attained by proceeding with the Business, rather than by making dilatory Motions which the Government are bound to oppose.

DR. CLARK: I rose last night, about 11 o'clock, to move the reduction of the salary of the Scotch Lord Advocate; but another hon. Member caught the eye of the Chairman, and a jump was made from the 14th to the 29th Vote. I called attention to the fact later on, and was told that I could not then raise my Motion, but that I could do it on the Report stage. At a quarter-past 1 I moved to report Progress, in order that the Committee might have time to consider these questions; but the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House refused to agree to it. Now, at 3 o'clock in the morning, he offers us time to discuss these matters. But why not take them on Thursday night at 1 o'clock, instead of now? It is the obstinacy of the right hon. Gentleman that refuses it. We want a fair time to bring before the House a serious grievance, and we contend that after 3 o'clock in the morning is not a fair time.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I want to point out that the hon. Member can attain his object much more efficiently by moving on the Vote itself. That will give him the opportunity he desires.

DR. CLARK: That will be at the end of the Session.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope it will be very much before that.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I can assure the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House that last night a great many Members, and myself among others, were desirous of bringing forward questions on the Vote of Supply in which we took the very greatest interest; but at the instance of the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), who, though he would hardly get credit for it, urged his colleagues on these Benches not to speak, so that the Vote might be got through last night, we refrained from doing so. I hoped in complying with my hon. Friend's request that I should have an opportunity of speaking on the Report stage. I might point out, in support of our right to a discussion on Report of Supply, that the Government, having taken the whole time of the House, give private Members no opportunity of bringing forward any question whatever affecting their Constituencies. I asked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, a short time ago, if he would give the House an opportunity of discussing a certain question with reference to Irish affairs before he took any action on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman answered by saying that he had no doubt my ingenuity would find an opportunity for discussing the matter. Well, my ingenuity has not up to this been able to find a single occasion for bringing forward the special matter to which I wished to call attention, and this is the first and only opportunity which has been afforded to me, but which I certainly decline to avail of at 3 o'clock in the morning, as I could not adequately deal with the matter.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I intended to-night, on the Motion for the Adjournment of the House, to rise and call attention to a matter which occurred earlier in the day with regard to a matter of Procedure. I may as well do it now. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that you allowed the First Lord of the Treasury to make a Motion—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! It is not competent to the hon. and learned Gentleman to raise that question on this Motion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I understood that, on a Motion for Adjournment, any question could be raised. Do you still rule, Sir, that I cannot raise this now.

MR. SPEAKER: It is not a question of Order that can now be raised. The matter before the House is the adjournment of the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then, with regard to the Motion now before the House, the First Lord of the Treasury has said that these Motions are not creditable to the House. But I will point out that it is not creditable to the House to take money by means of this kind of Vote on Account, and it is not creditable to thus try and get £3,000,000 granted at this hour in the morning, and to refuse us a reasonable time to raise questions of importance on the Report stage. I had intended to raise a question with regard to Ireland; but there is, so far as I can see, no Irish Officer in his place. Is it to be supposed we can have an effective discussion on Irish topics under those circumstances? Nobody has the duties of the Department more at his fingers' end than the Chief Secretary. I do not see him here; but, certainly, his Assistant the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet is true to the death. I think the Chief Secretary ought to be in his place, especially as he is paid a large salary. It does seem unfair, on the part of the Government, to expect us to go on with the Business at this hour, and at a time when the responsible Officer for Ireland is not in his place. If we raise Irish questions the right hon. Gentleman should be on the spot to answer us.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Question before the House is one of adjournment. The hon. and learned Member must confine himself to that.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I do think, under the circumstances, we must persevere with this Motion as the Chief Secretary is absent. On a previous occasion, some trouble was experienced in getting him here. Will the Government undertake to send for him, if we raise the Irish question now?

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.): I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, whether or not he is reasonable in objecting to this adjournment? This is not a reasonable hour to go on with the discussion on these Votes. The offer just made by the right hon. Gentleman is simply illusory. He says we shall have an opportunity of raising the questions we wish to when the Votes are taken seriatim in Committee. That simply means some time in the remote future, and if an hon. Member were anxious now to raise a matter of an urgent nature, he might by waiting as suggested destroy all his chances of securing a remedy. These Votes are seldom taken before the 1st of July. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will agree to the Motion for Adjournment. Hon. Members on this side are not extravagant in their demands. They say they will be satisfied if Report is taken at 1 o'clock on Thursday morning; and if the right hon. Gentleman would conform to our wishes in these small matters, and would not fight about trifles, he would get on very much better. It would only be a judicious thing to accede to the Motion, and let us wind up the Business of the night and go home.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I would draw attention to the fact that if we pass this Vote, the Government will have obtained rather more than three months' Supply. I notice that Supply commences on the 31st March, and, therefore, they will have got enough to carry them on till the 1st July. I do not intend to go into the matters they hope to get through before that day; but I have no doubt they expect, by that time, an alteration in the position of the Irish Members; that they trust by means to be taken outside the House to deal effectually with them. We have good reason for discussing these matters fully now. When this Vote came on last night, it was after a long debate in which the Military Members had wearied the House, and having spoken one way, voted the other; and we had little or no opportunity of raising the questions we wanted to. There are several matters of great importance to us. For instance, there is the Registrar General's Vote. There is a certain scheme for altering the status of the clerks in his office. It was smuggled through the Law Department at the Castle, but we were promised an opportunity of discussing it here. It would, however, be impossible for us to do it at this hour in the morning. There are many other Votes of a similar character, and it is simply indecent to take them at this period of the Sitting. We ask the First Lord of the Treasury to act reasonably in this matter, and not rush this Vote of £3,000,000 through the House now without discussion. We may never have an opportunity of discussing it, if we do not take it at this stage. You may have got rid of all of us before the Votes are taken in detail, for we may by that time all be locked up in Irish gaols.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I appeal to the Government to consent to this, and to give us the opportunity we ask of raising questions of importance to us. The right hon. Gentleman promises us a discussion on a future occasion; but, probably, by that time many of us will not be here.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I join in the protest against taking the Vote at this inconvenient hour, and on a Motion of this character I had intended to move the reduction of the salary of the Attorney General for Ireland, on account of his action in a prosecution in which it was alleged that the Irish police had very seriously misconducted themselves. There is, too, another matter to which I wished to direct the attention of the Government. But it is practically impossible to do it at the time at which the First Lord of the Treasury wishes to discuss these matters. I refer, Sir, to the failure of the Government to appoint a Judge to the Common Pleas Division, although two months ago they urged it was of great importance to do so. This is a very important matter. It is ridiculous to ask us to go into these discussions at half-past 3 in the morning. The Government should remember that a very short ago they came down to this House, with proposals to enact a permanent Rule prohibiting this House sitting after midnight, and having thus expressed their view as to the hour at which discussions should take place. I do think it is a little audacious on their part to expect us to vote enormous sums on account at this hour in the morning. I trust that the Government will not persist in their intention of insisting on this Vote. There are important points on which we want information, and we ought to have some opportunity of discussing them. The Government should take into consideration the fact that they have had all the time of the House since the beginning of the Session, and have prevented private Members from bringing before the House various subjects.

Mr. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I am surprised at the attitude of the Government in trying to force us to grant £3,000,000 of money at this hour in the morning. They seem to altogether ignore appeals from this side of the House, and when I say appeals, I only mean the word in the sense that we are claiming our right to an opportunity of discussing these questions. It is all very well to get up and say you can talk now, and we will answer you. But that is not enough. Hon. Members below me want to bring before the House some grievances which might or might not occupy a few minutes; but hon. Members, when they do that, are anxious to do it at a time when their remarks will get into the public Press. We have no personal advantage in that; but we do hold that the discussion should take place at an hour at which it is possible for our grievances, and the Minister's reply to us, to be reported. We cannot hope to do much against the majority in this House, but we do wish to try and exercise some moral influence on public opinion outside. I do think it unreasonable, after the many hours we have been in attendance in this House, to ask us, at half-past 3 in the morning, to go on with this Vote, especially as we have to meet here again at 12 o'clock to-day. The right hon. Gentleman might as well be graceful for once—I do not mean for once in his lifetime, but graceful for once towards the Irish Members—and give up his stubborn attitude.

Mr. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I rise to join in the appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury. There are many subjects for discussion arising out of this £3,000,000 Vote, and, surely, this is not an hour at which we can be expected to transact Business of such importance. Let the right hon. Gentleman look at his own supporters, and see if his lieutenants are in a fit condition to enter into these matters. It would be a disgrace if, in the present state of the House, we voted away £3,000,000 of money. I think most of the Members of the House have already gone to their homes, and those left are quite ready for their beds; and I confess I do not think we are prepared now to give sufficient consideration to a Vote of this sort. It is time the House adjourned.

The House divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 103: Majority 48.—(Div. List, No. 150.)

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Will the Government now send for the Chief Secretary, in order that we may resume the debate upon Irish matters? It will, no doubt, be easy to find him; and if the Government will assure us that the right hon. Gentleman will shortly be in his place, prepared, as we are, to go on with Business, I will withdraw the Motion, which I now make, that this debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): It is not my intention to prolong this contest. Sir, I have some consideration for your health, and for the officers of the House. But I must make an emphatic protest against this deliberate waste of the time of the House. Reference has been made to the opinion of the country upon the conduct of Business. Yes, Sir, the country will form its judgment upon the action of hon. Members below the Gangway, when we protest against this constant delay in the conduct of the Business of the House, to the detriment of every interest in the country. I consent to the adjournment.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.): The right hon. Gentleman tells us the public will judge. I do not know if he realizes the issue which is placed before the country. It is, whether a discussion of a Vote of nearly £4,000,000 can be properly carried on between 3 and 4 in the morning. I think, upon that question, the country will decide that the Opposition is right, and the Government wrong.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

EAST INDIA STOCK CONVERSION BILL.—[BILL 263.]

(Sir John Gorst, Mr. Jackson.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I must really ask the Government not to go on with this Bill now. The Bill was placed on the Notice Paper only the day before yesterday, and is being shoved on in the most unreasonable way. The Government may think this is a proper way of getting on with Business, and of getting the public money; but we are here to prevent the public money being unduly spent, and I sincerely hope some more time may be allowed us for consideration of this Bill. I will now move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Dr. Tanner.)

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): Of course, if hon. Members are determined to oppose Progress, I shall not persist. I may just mention that, so far from this being a Bill for spending public money, it is a Bill for saving money; and if hon. Members were as anxious for the benefit of our Indian fellow-subjects as they profess to be, they would not attempt to stop the Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I appeal to my hon. Friend (Dr. Tanner) to withdraw his Motion.

DR. TANNER: Of course, I will defer to the wish of my hon. and learned Friend, and will withdraw the Motion; but I must protest most strongly against the way in which Government measures are brought on at a very late hour, and pushed through Committee at the close of a prolonged Sitting.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Power of trustees, &c. in relation to exchange of stock).

Amendment proposed.—(Mr. Salt.)

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham): I may explain that this is a technical Amendment, which, with others, is proposed to enable holders of 4 per cent Stock, who are trustees for minors or persons of unsound mind, to exchange such Stock for 3½ per cent Stock. The Amendments are suggested by the Bank of England and gentlemen who are aware of Stock standing in small amounts in the name of trustees, and they have been submitted to the Attorney General, and approved by him, from the point of view of a protector of the rights of minors and persons of unsound mind.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I understand that the power is permissive; and, if so, will it not be somewhat expensive for a trustee to make application for the consent of a Judge of the High Court? Is it not desirable that the conversion should be made compulsory, at once protecting a guardian who has not the power of varying the terms of his trust, and saving the expense of going through the formalities of getting the consent of the Judge to the transfer?

SIR JOHN GORST: It will give the power to a guardian to effect the conversion at a trifling cost.

Amendment agreed to.

Further Amendment proposed.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): We do not hear a word of the Amendments as they are proposed, or when put from the Chair, and we are passing clauses we really know nothing about.

MR. CHANCE: I would appeal to the hon. and learned Attorney General, would it not be better to make the conversion of the Stock held by trustees compulsory? Will not the form prescribed imply considerable expense to holders of Stock of small amounts? Would it not be better to make the conversion of the Stock compulsory at once?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): There will be no great expense incurred, and the conversion is optional, and alternative to the redemption of the Stock at par. The guardian may withhold his consent to the exchange.

MR. CHANCE: As I understand the clause, it is introducing an entirely new principle into lunacy practice.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: It may be as the hon. Member says; but, at this late hour, I will not enter upon an argument. I can only say that it is, in our opinion, a proper course in the interest of those concerned. Of course, the hon. Member will have the opportunity of looking into the matter and raising any specific point later.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think the Government will recognize the reasonableness of reporting Progress.

SIR JOHN GORST: Of course, if such a Motion is pressed, I cannot resist it; but I would remind the Committee of the importance of time in the matter. If we pass the Bill through Committee to-night, it can be printed and set down for Report on Thursday, and we shall then have an opportunity of considering it.

MR. CHANCE: Very well; I agree to that.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Thursday, and to be printed.
[Bill 267.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."
—(Mr. Jackson.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.)

Upon this Motion, Sir, I rise to a point of Order. It will be within your recollection that I raised the question earlier in the day, in regard to a Motion made by the First Lord of the Treasury, to which neither I nor anyone else offered any opposition. The point on which I asked your ruling was in reference to the Resolution passed by the House that the several stages of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill should have precedence as the first Business of the day whenever it was set down. Now, what I have to submit for your ruling, Sir, is—and I do so only because it is a thing that may occur again—the fact that the first Business of the day was the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! It is not competent for the hon. and learned Gentleman to dispute my ruling; but I may tell him, for his information, that Motions at half-past 4 are not included in the ordinary Motions for the day; they stand in a category by themselves. In that sense I gave my ruling, which I shall not permit the hon. Gentleman to dispute.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Of course, Sir, I know I must not attempt to do that without Notice of a distinct Motion; but what I want to point out is—and I ask the question, because it may occur again in another case—that the discussion of such a Motion as we had early in the day might last an entire night, and would it not, therefore, be the first Business of the day?

MR. SPEAKER: The duration of a debate on a Motion brought on at half-past 4 does not affect the principle at all.

Question put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at Four o'clock.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION.

Clause 2 (Extension of summary jurisdiction).

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I beg to move the omission in page 2, line 14, of the words—

"Any person who shall commit any of the following offences in a proclaimed district."

I believe that there exists some mysterious person termed a "draftsman" in the Irish Office. Who he is I do not know, but he receives annually about £2,000; and I think that for £2,000 a-year we might expect something like English grammar, although we may not expect decent drafting. In moving the Amendment, which stands first on the Paper, I will read the few lines of the second clause. They commence by stating—and one would imagine that the clause would go on to describe the offences in question. It does no such thing. It goes on to describe the offenders in a series of sub-sections, but not the offences. I also wish to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that a most extraordinary method has been used in framing the first line in this clause, because it assumes that every person sent to this special tribunal shall, as a preliminary condition, have committed an offence within the knowledge of some person, and, therefore, must be found guilty as a matter of course. I can conceive no drafting more bad or more grossly careless than to say—"Any person who shall commit an offence shall be tried for it." The whole essence of law is to discover whether a person has committed an offence or not. It is ridiculous to provide that a person shall have committed an offence. It is for these reasons that I move the first Amendment that stands in my name; but I may explain that it is intended to transpose the words of the clause. The clause will read—

"Any person may be prosecuted before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction under this Act who shall have taken part in any criminal conspiracy to compel or induce any person or persons either not to fulfil his or their legal obligations," &c.

That will, at least, make the clause English, and it will not alter the principle of the clause in the slightest degree. What I object to is the bad grammar and the bad drafting of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 14, leave out from "who" to "district" in line 15 inclusive.—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. CHANCE: Before the Attorney General for Ireland rises may I ask, as a point of Order, whether, if this Amendment is passed, it will be competent to move the substitution of the word "shall" for "may"?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The hon. Member complains of the drafting of the Bill, and he has made a direct attack upon the draftsman. Now, I am not the draftsman myself, but I have found no difficulty in understanding what the clause means, and I do not believe that any tribunal or any Member of the House, on reading over the clause, if he brings his reason to bear on it, will have any difficulty in understanding it. The Government are asked now to recast the entire clause, not for the purpose of altering the sense of the clause, but to meet the views of hon. Members below the Gangway opposite as to mere terms of expression. The Government are not disposed to comply with the request of the hon. Member. If it can be shown that the clause is not intelligible, we will be ready to listen to any suggestion to alter it which may be made. Nothing, however, of the kind has been done, and the clause, as it stands, is perfectly intelligible. I may tell the hon. Member that however wide his knowledge of the Statutes may be, and whatever may be the faults of the draftsman employed in drawing up this clause, the precedents of other Acts which are now on the Statute Book have been followed. The sentence specially pointed to by the hon. Member is one which will be thoroughly understood by the Court, and will undoubtedly have the proper construction put upon it. I contend that it is perfectly clear as it stands, and that it is altogether unnecessary to alter it.

MR. CHANCE: I am sorry that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should have exhibited such warmth in defending the absent draftsman. Considering the warmth which he has displayed, I think it may be rightly assumed that the employment of this individual has been a job to oblige one of the right hon. Gentleman's political confères.

MR. HOLMES: I certainly did feel it necessary to defend the draftsman, seeing that he has actually followed the precedents of other Statutes in drawing up the clause.

MR. CHANCE: Who is he?

MR. HOLMES: That has nothing to do with the matter.

MR. CHANCE: What is his name?

MR. HOLMES: He has been in the Irish Office for years—long before I came to the Office I now hold.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member for Kilkenny that he is introducing into the Question an element which is totally unnecessary.

MR. CHANCE: Of course I bow to your ruling, Sir; but I retain my silent opinion upon the matter. The right hon. and learned Gentleman made an attack upon me, and I think I had a right to know what was the motive which actuated him in doing so. I never claimed to be a judge of the technicalities of the Statutes at large; but I have pointed out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that if he would apply his mind to this section he would see that it is ungrammatical and nonsensical. I do not think any parallel can be found for it except in a Game Act which was passed by the Tory Party. One page in that Act contains 13 mistakes in grammar and English. The first line of this clause says—"Any person who shall commit any of the following offences," and then 1st sub-section goes on to describe the offenders—namely, "any person who shall take part in any criminal conspiracy," &c. According to this a person is an offence and not an offender. I can assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that in raising the question I was only anxious to maintain the reputation of the Tory Bench, represented so brilliantly by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, in matters of grammar. I only ask them to make this clause at least intelligible and decent grammar, and, in reply, the Attorney General for Ireland launches out into personalities and accusations that I not only know the whole of the Statutes, but wish to pose as an authority upon grammar. Now, I know nothing of the kind; but I do know what grammar is, and I ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland to say whether the words of this clause are either decent grammar or common sense?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I do not see why, when my hon. Friend points out that the language of the clause is indefensible, the right hon. and learned Gentleman should commence to jeer. I think it the statutable right, if the Irish people are to be sent to prison, that they should be committed to gaol with all the pomp of the English language grammatically expressed. Here we have a clause which will be intelligible only to the understanding of a Resident Magistrate. My contention is that it should be intelligible to the meanest intelligence. We are not informed who the person is who has drawn up the clause. Is it some superhuman individual who has no existence either in this House or anywhere else? The clause says—

"Any person who shall commit any of the following offences in a proclaimed district may be prosecuted before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction under this Act," &c.

And the first of the offences specified is, 'Any person who shall take part in any criminal conspiracy.' Therefore, one of the offences is a person. Now, a person is no offence, and if he is to get six months imprisonment, let him get it by virtue of a provision grammatically expressed in an Act of Parliament. I presume that the First Lord of the Treasury has a proper knowledge of grammar, and I would respectfully ask him how he would construe this clause? I defy even his intelligence to put the clause into anything like decent form. The Irish people do not pretend to speak the English language with a cockney accent; but they have some idea of English grammar, and I hope the Government will give this Bill to them in a reasonable shape. I see that the Government is now reinforced by the presence of the Irish Solicitor General, who is well known in the Law Courts as a master of diction. I trust that he will get up and explain the language of the clause.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): There can be no doubt that the words of the clause are imperfect so far as their grammatical construction is concerned, and perhaps it may not be easy to remedy them. Probably the best course would be to omit in line 17 the words "any person who shall take part in any criminal conspiracy," &c., and then define the offences instead of the offenders.

MR. CHANCE: That would get rid of one objection, but another still remains—namely, the words "who shall commit any of the following offences." I think it is ridiculous in an Act of Parliament to lay down a condition precedent to the trial of a person that that person shall commit an offence.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The hon. Gentleman has appealed to me on a question of legal style.

MR. CHANCE: No; upon a question of grammar.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no question upon which I am less competent to give an opinion than legal style. I must confess that I am not an admirer of the language of an Act of Parliament. It appears to me, however, that the clause comes up to the standard of legal English. It has the advantage of being perfectly intelligible at the first glance. The Bill has been carefully drawn up, and will have to pass the rigid scrutiny of both Houses of Parliament. I hope the time of the Committee is not to be wasted in discussing at length questions of improving the mere style of the clauses of the Bill.

MR. CHANCE: English grammar.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Bill is quite good enough English and good enough grammar for an Act of Parliament. It is, at all events, what every Act of Parliament is not—namely, uncommonly good sense. I quite admit that every precaution should be taken in the Bill to make its meaning perfectly clear, so that on the face of the Bill itself, everybody may know what we intend to adopt, and what we shall adopt. But if hon. Gentlemen ask us to consider all these emendations in order to improve the legal style of the Bill, by what time do they think the deliberations of this Committee are likely to end?

MR. CHANCE: Next year.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the Committee ought to confine the discussion to questions of substance, and that we should not be called upon to waste our time in discussing questions of grammar and parsing. Are we to spend hour after hour in discussing Amendments merely to satisfy the fastidious tastes of hon. Members opposite? I am sorry that in discussing the clause the hon. Member for Kilkenny should have considered it necessary to attack a gentleman who is not a Member of this House. Even if the Bill was open to adverse criticism as to its drafting, which I believe is not the case, I would ask the hon. Gentleman to recollect the great amount of labour that has been thrown upon the draftsman of the Irish Office during the last few months, not only in regard to this Bill, but the Bill now before the House of Lords, and also other Bills. I think there should be ample excuse for errors even far greater than any that can be found within the four corners of this Bill. I feel that I should not be in Order in pursuing that matter at length; but I feel bound to stand up for this gentleman who was not appointed by the present Government, but who has long held this Office and has long carried out the important functions which he now discharges so well in the Irish Office, and to the satisfaction of successive Chief Secretaries.

MR. CHANCE: You ought to give his name.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is no business of mine to give the name. The hon. Member will have no difficulty in finding it out if he desires, and if there is any hon. Gentleman who wishes to impugn the character of this gentleman, the proper time for doing so will be when the Vote for the payment of his salary comes before the House. I hope that hon. Gentlemen will understand the principles which the Government have laid down for themselves in this matter. They are ready to accept any Amendment which may be required to make the meaning of the Bill, if possible, more clear, but they are not ready, and they will not consent, as far as they can avoid it, to waste the time of the Committee in discussing Amendments which, at the best, are mere Amendments for the improvement of style.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The point we take up in regard to the Bill is this. We say it is quite bad enough that the measure is to take away the liberties of the Irish people, but, at any rate, we are entitled to interfere when we find that it is making ducks and drakes with the Queen's English. We are not able to agree to the provisions of the Bill, but, at any rate, let us be able to parse it, and I respectfully submit that we are not in a position to do that now. The House has been engaged during the past fortnight in discussing points of law, and we have now arrived at a moment when it has become necessary to discuss points of grammar. I think the time has come when some strong steps should be taken. Will the Chief Secretary for Ireland get up and tell us what the word "person" in all the later sub-sections is, and what is the nominative?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I rise to Order. Is the hon. Member in Order in debating anything but the Amendment before the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN: The observations of the hon. Member are connected with the Amendment; but I think the discussion has degenerated into a matter which is of infinitely little importance, and I hope the hon. Member will confine himself, as much as possible, to the point at issue.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I think we are entitled to complain of the unreasonable view the Government take of the Amendments we submit to the Committee. I will not, however, pursue further the line of observations which you, Sir, have commented on; but I will say this, that when we point out a blot in any of these sections, whether it is a blot in respect of substance or of grammar, the Government, with pig-headed obstinacy, as if in some way their character was involved, refuse to listen to our complaints. I fail to see that we are in any way concerned with the character of the draftsman of this Bill. Let us take the section as it stands, and see whether it is good or bad, right or wrong, without regard to the character of the man who drew it up. On that ground I put it to the Government whether, in regard to their own character for knowledge of the English language, they do not think it will be compromised before the public if this section is passed into law in its present form?

MR. O'HEA (Donegal, W.): Her Majesty's Government are so much in the habit of swallowing camels that it is only natural for them to strain at a gnat. Anything more clumsy or more ungrammatical than this clause could not be included in any section of an Act of Parliament. The Attorney General for Ireland has defended the Government draftsman, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland has chimed in with the same line of argument. Of course, the draftsman may be good enough for Her Majesty's Government, and the construction of this particular section of an Act of Parliament may be good enough for the intellect and capacity of the Resident Magistrates in Ireland. But I think we have a perfect right to point out blunders and stupidity wherever we find them. Everyone must see, upon reading the section, that my hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny was perfectly right in the observations he made.

MR. CHANCE: No doubt, this is a very small point, and I am sorry that the Government have taken up such an unreasonable attitude on the matter. I appealed to the Chief Secretary for Ireand as an authority on English grammar, but he declined to respond to the appeal. The Irish Members must act accordingly, and I shall press for a Division. The sooner, therefore, we take a Division the better.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 101; Noes 81: Majority 20.—(Div. List, No. 151.)

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to move in line 14, after "shall," to insert "after the passing of this Act." I hope that the Government will be prepared to accept that Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 14, after "shall," insert "after the passing of this Act."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: According to the principle I have just laid down, I do not think the Government ought to accept this Amendment, which certainly does not make the clause more clear. The meaning of the clause is perfectly plain, and nothing will be gained by accepting the Amendment. I, therefore, ask the Committee to reject it.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I fail to gather from the right hon. Gentleman's remarks what his reason is for opposing the Amendment. Do I understand him to say, after what has occurred in reference to the Amendment moved by my hon. Friend just now, that the Government are so exceedingly nice in regard to the phraseology of this clause that they will not accept the words "after the passing of this Act," because there may be tautology? We were told a few minutes ago that the capacity of the Irish Resident Magistrates is such that it is necessary for the Government to put their clause into bad English in order to enable those gentlemen to understand it. But in regard to this Amendment the position of the Government is this—that these gentlemen—the Resident Magistrates—are so nice upon the question of grammar, that their feelings will be shocked if the clause contains a single superfluous word. I will only point out that the words "after the passing of this Act" are usually employed in Acts of Parliament.

No doubt, the words "under this Act" appear in the clause; but it does not necessarily follow that the word "shall" involves the future tense. The Government intend, and we intend, that these clauses shall not be retrospective in their operation, but that they shall only apply to crimes committed after the passing of the Act; and, therefore, I do not see that the innocent Amendment I have proposed does more than put in clearer language that intention. Why not insert "after the passing of the Act" if they really mean after the passing of the Act?

MR. CHANCE: The first words of the 1st clause are—

"Where a sworn information has been made that any offence to which this section applies has been committed in a proclaimed district."

The 2nd clause contains the words "in a proclaimed district." But the district cannot be proclaimed until after the Act has been passed, and, therefore, the section must apply to the future. The same point arose on the 1st clause, in reference to the power to enable the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland to put the clause in force; and in that discussion we discovered, to our surprise and alarm, and certainly much to the surprise of the English language, that a proclaimed district meant a district not proclaimed, but which may be proclaimed. The Chief Secretary for Ireland tells us the meaning of the clause is perfectly clear; but we know that bad grammar often has some hidden and subtle meaning, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will tell us how it is perfectly clear, and that it is not to deal with an offence committed before the drafting of the Act. If it is desired to prevent a prosecution for offences committed before the passing of the Act, then I insist that the Amendment is necessary. We do not now want the Government to be grammatical; we have given up that point; but we do want them to make the clause intelligible, and they can only do that by accepting the Amendment, and clearly showing what they mean.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Take the case of conspiracy. Are your inquiries to extend over several counties and over a long period of time? If not, how are you to control the Resident Magistrates, unless these words are inserted in the clause? Suppose that the Act passes on the 1st of August, and that an offence committed on the 2nd of August has to be proved by some publication in a newspaper which took place on the 1st of July. Are we to be told that the Resident Magistrate may allow evidence to be given of a publication in a newspaper before the passing of the Act? I maintain that, as the clause stands, he would be so allowed; and if that is the intention of the Government, why not make it perfectly plain? We know what took place in regard to the case of Mr. William O'Brien and Mr. John Dillon. In order to provide absolute proof of the connection of Mr. William O'Brien with United Ireland in 1887, a letter was produced which was written by Mr. William O'Brien in 1881, in order to show that he was still the editor of United Ireland, five or six years after having written the letter. That was the only prima facie evidence before the Resident Magistrate to prove that Mr. William O'Brien was the editor of that paper now. Suppose the Government put the editor of United Ireland under this clause, and subject him to a preliminary inquiry, are we to have this letter of 1881 trotted out again as prima facie evidence? Unless the words "after the passing of this Act" are inserted in this clause, the Resident Magistrate would undoubtedly admit this letter as proof, and would allow a case to go to the jury, being himself both jury and Judge at the same time. I put it to the Attorney General for Ireland whether, proof being tendered of something done before the passing of the Act, the Resident Magistrate would not admit that proof? I think the clause, as it stands, is most unreasonable, and I am of opinion that the attitude the Government are taking is unfair. If they really intend that the Act is only to date from the time it receives the Sign Manual of the Queen, it is not reasonable for them to refuse the Amendment.

Question put.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have now to move, in the first line of the clause, to leave out the word "commit," in order to substitute the words "be proved, on the complaint of any injured person, to have committed." The clause would then read—

"Any person who shall be proved, on the complaint of any injured person, to have committed any of the following offences."

The object of the Amendment is to decide in whom the initiation of the prosecution shall rest. The Government will now be tested as to the reality of their desire to put down crime by the way in which they treat this Amendment. In Ireland, hitherto, no individual was ever prosecuted personally, and there has grown up a practice which Mr. George Waters, the County Court Judge for Waterford, has happily termed "intimidation in the air," when a crime is alleged to have been committed the police always prosecute. No person alleged to have been intimidated ever prosecutes. Mr. Waters had before him a case in which a man was alleged to have said—

"I advise the Irish people to have nothing to do with evicted farms, and I say further that a person who takes an evicted farm is a person who is unworthy of social amenities."

This language was not directed against any individual; but the man who made use of it was prosecuted by the police on the ground that he had intimidated some person unknown. Now, I wish by this Amendment to get rid of the possibility of prosecuting any man for intimidating some person or persons unknown. In the case to which I have referred, Mr. George Waters decided that there is no such offence as what he called "intimidation in the air." I may add, that Mr. Waters came to that conclusion, after a Resident Magistrate had convicted the man and sentenced him to two or three months' imprisonment. Therefore, I think the Government ought to say at once whether "intimidation in the air" is their view in passing this Act, or whether it ought not to be necessary to produce the corpus of some individual who alleges that his mind or body has been injured by the acts or words of some other individual. I hope the Government will see their way to accept so reasonable a proposition. I think it is a monstrous thing that the police force in Ireland should have nothing to do except to spend their time in getting up these offences in the interests of the landlords, and that, in addition to that, they should be allowed to act as prosecutors, taking out both summons and warrant, without putting the injured person to any trouble whatever. I have no doubt that the Under Secretary for Ireland would say that the intimidation is so great that it is impossible to get anybody in Ireland to prosecute. But let me remind him that this Bill is to put an end to intimidation, and we are told by the First Lord of the Treasury that it will make Ireland happy, contented, and prosperous. The right hon. Gentleman says—"Once pass this Bill, and the intimidation, which is now going about like a foul spectre, will be laid," and, therefore, no person need be in the least degree afraid of intimidation, because law and order will be in such splendid working order that everyone will be able to go about, what has been called in euphemistic terms, his "lawful business"—that is, the business of the landlords, and resort to land-grabbing and other occupations of the same kind. I maintain that the person aggrieved ought to be the person who makes the complaint. In regard to the most serious crimes the individual is never the prosecutor, but you have the Crown Prosecutor, the Crown Solicitor, and everything emanating from the Crown. We are told that there is no necessity for individual initiation, but that we must rely on the State for everything. We are read a lesson every day upon that point by The Times. What we want is a little local option in the matter and not to have policemen "nosing" and scenting opportunities for prosecution. When once they get a quarry before them they hunt it down until it gets before the Resident Magistrate, who is himself an ex-policeman, or a disbanded soldier. If my Amendment is accepted it will remove a most irritating blister from the body politic in Ireland. In civil actions the Government do not interfere. If a Member of the Government made a bargain with me and did not observe that bargain I should not apply to the State for my remedy. Then why, in offences which concern quasi civil rights, am I not entitled to take the same course in a civil action? The Government will not be prepared to provide the money for payment of the expenses unless, perhaps, it is a civil action against The Times. A man goes along a road and he is grinned at or whistled at. In a famous case which occurred some time ago a man was accused of whistling at a landlord as he went along the road, in what the police called a "derisive manner," and he got six months for it. Now, I think, the landlord ought to have been left to his own remedy. It was not a criminal act, and ought only to have been the subject of a civil action for damages, although I very much doubt whether, under the circumstances, any prosecutor would have obtained civil damages at all. In cases of this kind the aggrieved person should bring his own prosecution, and if such prosecutions were initiated by individuals they would come into Court without the pomp, circumstance, and panoply of a great State trial. Under the Act of 1882, there was in no instance a private prosecution, but in every instance the prosecution was the act of the State, and consequently the Resident Magistrate had a mental stimulous administered to him as Crown prosecutor. I venture to think that if individuals who conceive themselves to have been wronged were left to prosecute at their own expense, they would appraise the inquiries received at their real value, and very few cases would find their way into Court. Under these circumstances, I hope the Government will see their way to remove this course of irritation from the Bill, and allow every injured individual to take his own remedy as he would be required to do in a civil case.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 14, leave out "commit," and insert "be proved on the complaint of any injured person, to have committed."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'commit' stand part of the Clause."

MR. HOLMES: The hon. and learned Member in moving the Amendment has referred to the analogy between civil actions and criminal prosecutions. Now, there is no analogy whatever between the two; and, I think, it is generally accepted by lawyers that there is an essential distinction as to the foundations on which a civil action reposes. A civil action is brought to vindicate the right of a particular individual, and not for the purpose of redressing a public wrong. But when a prisoner is prosecuted in a Criminal Court, whether a Superior Court, or a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, it is for the purpose of vindicated public justice. Accordingly, the law provides, and it is the law of England and Scotland, as well as Ireland, that criminal prosecutions may be brought forward in one of two ways. Even in England the Queen is always nominally the prosecutor, although an individual frequently sets the law in motion. In England there have been many instances in which an individual has taken upon himself the responsibility of dealing with a criminal prosecution; but in Ireland public prosecutions have been almost universal for a long time past, and I see no reason why the usual practice should be deviated from. A Royal Commission was appointed a good many years ago to inquire into the question, and in their Report the Commissioners spoke highly of the system which exists in Ireland and Scotland, and recommended that it should be extended to England. In Ireland the principle of setting the law in motion by the Public Prosecutor is the principle which underlies the Criminal Law. In the case of this clause there are a considerable number of offences mentioned in the second and subsequent sections, and it is not for the sake of the individual aggrieved, but for the sake of the public and public justice that there should be some one to put the law in motion. Prosecutions are instituted not for the redress primarily or solely of a wrong to an individual, but for the good of the public. It may not be safe or expedient for the individual to prosecute, and he may frequently prefer to acquiesce in the wrong. That would be an injury to the public, and, therefore, it is necessary to have some machinery for putting the law in motion. Accordingly we have framed the clause in this way, and, I may add, that it is in accordance with the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act. The hon. and learned Member has spoken of some public official who used the phrase "intimidation in the air." I do not quite understand what the hon. and learned Member means by that.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It was not my expression. It was a judicial expression.

MR. HOLMES: It may be a judicial expression, but I do not understand it. What I do understand is, that in a case such as he has mentioned a prosecution ought not to be undertaken.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman have any objection to make that decision binding?

MR. HOLMES: As I have already stated, I know nothing whatever about the decision; but what I do say is that it has been decided in such a case as that referred to by the hon. and learned Member that a prosecution would not lie.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the Government provide a record of decisions so that we may have a continuity of proceedings? The right hon. and learned Gentleman does not seem to treat the decision of one of the Government officials with any great respect. Here, in this section, you are inaugurating a machinery for the punishment of a large class of offences; and what I want to know is whether care will be taken that a decision given at one moment shall not be practically overridden by the decision of another Resident Magistrate in another case, because what I fear is that—"What in the captain is but a choleric word may in the soldier be rank blasphemy." The right hon. and learned Gentleman has not met one of my points at all—namely, that there should be some individual concerned in the prosecution who has been damnified. It is no answer for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to say that the State has been damnified. In this case, the Resident Magistrate is the State; he is appointed by the State; appointed at the pleasure of the State; and his salary may be raised or lowered at the will of the State. Therefore, the Resident Magistrate and the State are convertible terms, and it is not what the State thinks, but what the Resident Magistrate thinks. We are told that this is an Act passed for securing national liberty and for the prevention of crime. We are also told, in the language of the Primrose League, that it is an Act passed to put down crime, Boycotting, Moonlighting, and intimidation. There must be some intimidation, and there must be crime committed against some individual, and yet the Government meet my Amendment by saying that the initiation of a prosecution must rest with the police. There is another point which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not touched at all—namely, that in any prosecution it is necessary to show that some person has been injured. My Amendment deals with both points, because under it it would not only be necessary to show that some person had been injured, but to leave the prosecution to that particular individual. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has told me that in such a case as that which I refer to a prosecution would not lie, and he says that he does not understand the words used by the learned Judge at Waterford as to "intimidation in the air." In that case the prosecution was initiated by the Crown Prosecutor. I think there was great force in what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said about the necessity of vindicating a certain class of offences by the State. But surely it is only reasonable to provide that when an offence has been committed it should have been committed upon somebody, and that the person on whom it has been committed should prosecute.

MR. HOLMES: I have no desire to enter into the points which have been raised by the hon. and learned Member. My contention is that the clause is perfectly clear as it stands.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): There is a fallacy in the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman in reference to the system of public prosecutions in Ireland. The system recommended by the Commission to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has referred, was the system of having both in the Superior and Inferior Courts some local person charged with the prosecution of offences. But that principle has been largely extended by successive Governments during the last 13 or 14 years, and a very considerable number of offences have been dealt with. Latterly a sessional solicitor attends and prosecutes at Petty Sessions; but it was never part of the recommendation of the Commission, and could not have been part of the immemorial usage of Ireland into which that Commission inquired, that the constabulary established by Sir Robert Peel should be part and parcel of the system to which the Commission referred. If this principle were adopted in England and Scotland, instead of a police force of 30,000 men it would be necessary to increase it to at least 85,000, in order that there should be the same proportion to the population as that which exists in regard to the population of Ireland. In my opinion, nothing has done so much to bring the law into contempt in Ireland as the necessity for keeping in action some 14,000 persons, who are always on the look out for something to justify their very existence. It is a serious blunder in the Bill, and a serious mistake for any Government to think that by putting upon the police duties which they ought not to discharge, and by putting them in the odious position of being prosecutors and litigants, any advantage is to be derived. That was not part of the recommendation of the Commission to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has referred. But what they did recommend, and what this Amendment in no way interferes with, was that the system of the representation of the Crown by some local person in a prosecution in its various stages should be instituted in this country, as is the case in Ireland and Scotland now. No Englishman would stand such a harassing system as that to which we have been subjected for years. What would the English people think if they were subjected for five years to some hundred-thousand police constables going through the country, and justifying their existence by constant prosecutions? My opinion is that there would be universal discontent just as there is in Ireland. I believe that is one of the reasons why the law has been made so very unpopular in Ireland. I come now to the more immediate point involved in the Amendment, from which I have diverted away to the reference made by the Attorney General for Ireland to the recommendations of the Royal Commission. How do the Government justify the interference of the police with the tenure of farms, and the forcible possession of houses? After making repeated local inquiries, I have come to the conclusion that a great mistake has been made. Attention has been called to a case tried before Chief Baron Pallas, in which, at Gweedore, certain houses had been left by the landlord without a caretaker. In that case the police imagined that the old circular issued under the Act of 1882 in reference to Crimes was still actually in force, and they occupied themselves in watching as bailiffs the houses from which the tenants had been evicted—houses which were not only never re-entered, but which had never been closed. It was the interpretation of that circular which substantially gave rise to the prosecution before the Lord Chief Baron. In that case the Lord Chief Baron asked for the circular, and an objection was raised that it was a privileged document, that could not be gone into. I have only quoted this case in order to show that the interference of the police in regard to transactions under the Land Bill, and in reference to property, has been excessive, that they have pushed themselves unnecessarily into private matters, and that they make themselves the bailiffs' agents, and partizans of the landlords of the district. I entertain very strong feelings in the matter, and I think it is one which ought to be brought again and again under the notice of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, so that the Government may make up their mind before this Bill passes that the police shall not convert themselves into mere partizans upon either side in any locality. I think the provisions of this measure ought to be restricted to criminal offences, and not enter into disputes about the possession of property, and breaches of the law, or riots, or unlawful assembly, which are matters that can be made the subject of civil proceedings. As the law is at present administered in Ireland, and as the police are constituted, I know that they are constantly employed in connection with offences against property, in which scarcely any injury whatever has been committed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is perfectly correct when he says that there may be cases of public policy which would require the interference of the Public Prosecutor; but there are heaps of cases which may arise under this Act in which the initiation should be left in the hands of the individual injured, who ought to be the person to make the complaint to the magistrates.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): This Amendment raises two questions, each of which is of great importance. We acknowledge that there are cases which may arise where the initiative may be left to the authorities; but, on the other hand, there are many cases where we think the initiative of the police would be most injurious to the public peace and tranquillity. That is the first point raised by the Amendment, and the second point, equally important, is this—whether, in order to bring this clause into operation, there should be an individual distinctly indicated. I think the Attorney General for Ireland is quite right in saying that if you have a state of intimidation in a district, you may have an unwillingness on the part of a person to come forward and take the initiative, and that the Government will be right in retaining the initiative of the police in all cases where it can be distinctly proved that an individual has sustained injury. I believe I am right in saying that my hon. and learned Friend who drew up the Amendment will have no objection to amend the Amendment, so as to cover that case. It is a case in which, I think, the police have a right to take the initiative; but they have no right to take the initiative in a class of cases referred to by my hon. and learned Friend—that is to say, where the injury is not physical injury, is not injury to person, or a distinct injury to property, but a case in which a civil action would be brought. It is only right, in my opinion, that the Committee should establish a clear distinction between the initiative in the two cases. The second point of the Amendment is even more important than the first; and the Attorney General for Ireland seemed to me rather to confirm than to weaken our case by the statements he made upon it. What did the right hon. and learned Gentleman do? He referred to the language of the clause by way of proving that there is no necessity for the Amendment. Now, I contend that the language of the clause carries out and confirms the contention of my hon. and learned Friend instead of disposing of it. The Attorney General for Ireland says that this Bill follows the same lines as the Crimes Act of 1882. Let me take the last point first. Our experience of the Crimes Act of 1832 is the very reason why we object to the phraseology of the present clause. None of us would raise any objection to the clause if it were directed against violence or intimidation, against a particular individual. What we object to is that the clause does not pre-suppose injury to an individual at all, but would enable a Resident Magistrate to exercise the powers of the Act against a class or classes. How did that operate under the Act of 1882? We raised the very same question when that Bill was before the House. Of course, our arguments were treated in the manner in which they usually are when a Bill like this is before the House, and our fears were regarded as entirely imaginary.

[Ninth Night.]

But what took place? Let me give an instance to show how the Act will work—one of the worst episodes of the régime of the Crimes Act of 1882. My hon. Friend who now represents the College Green Division of Dublin (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) went down to Westmeath. He made a speech, urging upon the farmers of Westmeath the duty of giving a fair day's wage for a fair day's labour to the labourers of Westmeath. No advice, as I think, could be more advisable or more necessary. What happened? My hon. Friend's language was not accompanied by intimidation of any kind whatever. It was simply exhortation and advice, but in no stronger language than was necessary by the state of the case. My hon. Friend was brought up before the magistrates—the very class of gentlemen who are to have the power of putting this clause into operation; and they held him to have been guilty of intimidation, not towards a particular individual, not towards a certain number of persons in the district who were specified, but to the farmers of Westmeath at large. Now, the farmers of Westmeath, I may say, are about as robust a class of men as any that exists in the whole of the country. Yet the proposition was gravely laid down and carried into force by the Resident Magistrate, and afterwards by the County Court Judge, that the speech of my hon. Friend came within the purview of a clause like this, because it was calculated to intimidate a class consisting of 10,000, 20,000, or 30,000 farmers of the county. Immediately after my hon. Friend was imprisoned on the accusation that he had attempted to intimidate the farmers of Westmeath, a vacancy arose in the Representation of Westmeath, and the very men he was accused of intimidating returned him on several nomination papers, and there was not the ghost of an opposition to his election. As a matter of fact, the class he was said to have intimidated made their intimidator their honoured Representative in this House; and not only did they do that, but they paid his election expenses, and subscribed a handsome testimonial to him. There you had a man charged with intimidating a class who sent him to Parliament, and, to his and their honour, generously and liberally rewarded him for his services to them.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

Therefore, our fears are not imaginary; but I am dealing with a well-known precedent, in which my hon. Friend was subjected to gross outrages at the hands of political opponents, was condemned to the plank bed, to wear the prison garb, and to clean out his cell. Further than that, the governor of the gaol endeavoured to impose on him various things which were not included in the prison discipline, merely to degrade him; and at one time my hon. Friend was confined to his cell for two or three days without enjoying a moment of fresh air; and it was while he was being so treated that it was announced to him that those he was accused of intimidating had elected him as their Representative. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland knows all these facts as well, and possibly better, than I do; and yet he appeals to the precedent of the Act of 1882, not as a strong argument in favour of our proposition, but as an argument against it. Again, if we compare the words of the clause with those of any corresponding enactment for England, we shall find that in the latter case, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid) has pointed out, there must be alleged intimidation against some definite person, his wife or child, or injury to his property, whereas the whole purpose of the phraseology of this clause shows that it has been left studiously and intentionally vague, so as to include acts which, in the opinion of the Resident Magistrates, are calculated to intimidate a specified individual or individuals of a class consisting of many thousand persons. In the English law a crime must have been directed against a particular individual, and you must be able to bring up this particular individual, and to prove injury to his person or property. Let me turn from the limited scope of the phraseology of the English Act to the equally studied phraseology of the Irish Bill—namely, that—legal authority, use violence or intimidation (a) to or towards any person or persons, with a view to cause any person or persons either to do any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to do; or (b) to or towards any person or persons, in consequence either of his or their having done any act which he or they had a legal right to do, or of his or their having abstained from doing any act which he or they had a legal right to abstain from doing."

Let me take the plural number, with its intentional vagueness, as it appears in the Bill. In the first place, in the English Act, there must have been force and intimidation or violence used to a particular individual. But, here, all you have to do is to use words in the mildest form; and by the Definition Clause of the Bill it is declared that—

"The expression 'intimidation' includes any words or acts intended and calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of property, business, employment, or means of living."

So that the words used may not be intended to intimidate even a class, so long as, in the opinion, not of the class itself, but of the Resident Magistrate, they are calculated to intimidate that class. In every way I look at this clause it appears to be framed in the most objectionable manner. In the first place, the initiative is not to come from the person injured, but from the policeman and the State. In the second place, the injury is not defined as against a particular individual, but it may be against a class consisting of many thousands of persons. In the third place, even the class itself is not allowed the initiative, or, indeed, any opinion in the matter. The words which are used may not be words which the class against whom they are used regard as intimidation, but they are to be words which, in the opinion of another person—the Resident Magistrate—are calculated to intimidate. That is the way in which the clause is to be worked. In other words, the Resident Magistrate is to meet for and work for the people of the country. This Amendment, therefore, goes to the very heart and core of the Bill, and nothing shows more clearly than the speech of the Attorney General for Ireland the desperate and evil purposes to which the clause will be applied if it is to remain in its present shape. The Amendment, therefore, is one which we must press upon the Government to the utmost of our power.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I think this is an exceedingly important Amendment, and I wish once more, at this late hour, to protest against the habit of quoting the provisions of the Bill of 1882 as a sufficient justification of the present measure. We find that some of the Amendments which we are now moving were moved on that Bill, and when we have fully justified them by the arguments we have used, are we to be told, when experience shows that gross and serious mistakes have been made in the Irish Administration, that it is sufficient to say that so-and-so was in a Bill so many years ago? Are we to be told, for instance, if we wish to admit Irish leaseholders to the benefit of the Land Act, that they cannot be admitted because they are not in the Act of 1881? I hope the Committee will see the absurdity of carrying on such a mode of argument as that, and that it will see that, except in the case of legislation of an unprecedented character, no one ever thinks of basing his case upon such a contention. We complain now, as we complained in 1882, that this clause is so worded that it may be used by the officials of the Executive in Ireland in cases where no real grievance exists, and in cases where individuals, although by the Executive they may be alleged to have been Boycotted or intimidated, would not desire the law to be put in force at all. I say that our experience shows most clearly that this is by no means an imaginary fear on our part; it has been done continually. We have in Ireland the most multitudinous police in the whole world; we have four times as many as are necessary for the maintenance of law and order, and not only are the police so numerous, but there is an elaborate system of promotion going on in the ranks of the police—namely, a system based on the practice of giving marks for good conduct, the result of which is that you have every police constable from the 1st of January to the 31st of December in a state of intense eagerness to discover some crime or other. The men who get the best record and the most marks are those who get up the most cases, and thus we have the policemen outstepping the ordinary functions of the police; instead of confining themselves to protecting the rights of property they are ferreting about from morning till night trying to discover something that will justify their existence and abnormal pay, and manufacturing something when they cannot discover any real case. I will mention one instance within my own knowledge to show how this is done. I am not quite certain whether the Solicitor General for Ireland will consider this a case of very great hardship, but I contend that it is so. In many districts in Ireland where public feeling is excited, as it always is by evictions on a large scale, where the police know that places of entertainment and shops will be greatly injured in their trade by supplying the police and agents of the emergency association, and where there is no difficulty of getting food or what is required in the town, they have gone round to demand of traders that they should supply them, and the other persons I have referred to; and this has been done for the purpose of putting them between Scylla and Charybdis. Can anything be more cruel than that? The police know that all the legislation you pass cannot compel the shopkeepers in Ireland to deal with persons they do not want to deal with; and deliberately, in order to punish these men because they are Nationalists and have taken part in the Nationalist movement, they go round to the shopkeepers and say they must supply them and the bailiffs and emergency men whom they take round with them. In this way the shopkeepers are put in a dangerous position, for they will either have their licences opposed at the next Sessions or lose their trade. The Attorney General for Ireland pointed out that one sub-section of this clause makes it an offence to use intimidation towards any person. Of course, the act which I have described will be held to be intimidation towards emergency men and agents; the whole business will be manufactured from beginning to end, and made the means of most grievous and outrageous persecution against men who have committed no real crime. There can be no doubt that the clause will be used in that way; but this is only one instance out of a great number where it may be used by the police for prosecuting persons for their own ends. I find that in 1882 an Amendment exactly similar to the present was moved, and cases were quoted showing the gross persecution which could be carried on under the clause. It was shown clearly at that time that over and over again representations were made to the House, on the authority of Resident Magistrates and the police, of cases of intimidation in which the people alleged to be intimidated signed of their own free will statements that they had not been intimidated, and that there was no foundation for the charge. Of course we were met with the answer that these statements were wrung out of the persons who made them by fresh intimidation. I put it to hon. Members whether the business of any country can go on when its citizens are so weak in the legs that they want policemen to stand by and protect them? I ask where is the matter to end? Is this House to carry on the system for ever? Surely a justification of our present attitude is to be found in the fact that, although you would not listen to our arguments in 1882, now, after five years, we are told that the state of things is worse than ever. It is an evil principle from beginning to end. You have taught the people of Ireland, by proceedings of this kind, to be utterly and absolutely unreluctant on themselves, and to rely entirely on the interference of the police. It is a curse which every Chief Secretary you have sent to Ireland, and every Lord Lieutenant has been continually complaining of, that these people are perpetually running like whipped children to Dublin Castle, and begging to be protected. They say that they are so afraid of the Nationalists that they want the Government to protect them without anyone knowing it or whispering a single word about the matter. I say that such a system is as destructive to the people on whose behalf it is invoked as it is to the rest of the population. If it were true that such an elaborate system of intimidation existed in Ireland as you represent, I say that no one would dare to invoke the tremendous machinery of the law which you have provided. I say that it would be the duty of the Government to declare that such a class of people as I have referred to do not deserve protection. You are acting very foolishly in not telling these people that they must show themselves to be something more than women or little cowardly school-boys, and that if they have a Coercion Act passed on their behalf, at least they shall show that they have the courage to come forward and say that they have been injured.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I should like the Committee to understand what is my opinion of the working of this Act. As soon as the Act is passed, a printed form will be made out containing a list of the offences punishable under it; this form will be sent to the police barracks to be filled up week by week, and then a regular competition will commence among the police as to who shall put the greatest number of offences on the list. That is not a mere speculation or theory of my own, because, at the present moment, something very like this system is in existence in the City of Dublin and other parts of Ireland. On one side of the form is placed a list of the arrest cases, and on the other side a list of summons cases, and these forms are handed round the police barracks, and have, as I have said, to be filled up week after week. The result of this is that there is a struggle among the police to get the largest number of cases opposite their names, and those who do not show a favourable record, run a great risk of punishment by degradation. Within the last few months, a sergeant in the Dublin police has been put on half-pay for three months, the superintendent of his division having reported that he was an inefficient officer because he had not sent in a sufficient number of complaints against the publicans of Dublin and his fellow constables. Now, that is a very remarkable instance; but there is a case of another sergeant in the same division of the Dublin Metropolitan Police, who has been refused promotion on the same grounds—namely, that he had not made a sufficient number of complaints weekly and instituted a sufficient number of prosecutions. The result of this was that, as everyone knows, his juniors were promoted over his head. There are many of these frivolous prosecutions commenced by policemen. It was only the other day that a member of the Town Council of the City of Dublin was summoned before a Police Court, and fined for an offence which it was afterwards found he had never committed. Again, persons have been fined in Dublin for the alleged offence of hooting at the Lord Lieutenant, but, upon investigation, it was found that there was no truth in the charge, and the fines were remitted. What has happened in Dublin has happened all over the country, and will again happen all over the country when this Act is passed. The first step of some subordinate in Dublin Castle will be to make out a list of offences and circulate forms to the police in Ireland, intimating to the constables that they had better be active in working the Act, and the result will be wide spread injustice and false accusations against innocent men. I do not know whether the Government think that this will conduce to the peace of Ireland, and to the restoration of that social order which they have so much at heart; but my opinion is that it will have a directly opposite effect, and that in a short time you will have the whole of the country in a state of social chaos and disorder, compared with which the present state of things is peace and quietness.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): This Amendment is, I find, of such importance that I have no hesitation in saying that we must press it to the fullest extent on the attention of the Government. Many cases have occurred in Ireland, which enable us to understand the probable injustice that will be done to a large number of persons if the Amendment is not accepted. The Amendment recites that for a prosecution before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, it is necessary that the offence should be proved on the complaint on the injured person. I know an instance in which a Town Councillor in Cork was brought up and charged with making a speech, in which he had uttered words of an intimidatory character, by which certain persons in the locality were deterred from doing what they had a legal right to do, and the opinion was obtained from the presiding County Court Judge that the Act of Parliament was such that no public speaker ought to speak from a platform without there was a lawyer at his elbow. The gentleman I refer to made use of language of a perfectly legitimate character; he said it was the bounden duty of the tenant farmers in that district to combine for protection against rack-renting; but he had no desire in his mind, nor would any fair reading of his speech lead anyone to believe that any person had been intimidated. This gentleman, however, got two months in gaol, and had to sleep on a plank bed. I say, therefore, that the Government ought to accept this Amendment, which is a most reasonable one, and is only intended to prevent the recurrence in future of mistakes that have happened in the past. The Government say that they have no desire that the Bill should be used against their political opponents, or the rights of free speech; but that it will be used against crime and criminals, although every step we have taken in these discussions shows that it is intended for nothing of the kind. The more we progress through the clauses of the Bill the more do we discover the real intentions of the Government, and the more clearly do we perceive the way in which the Act will be worked in Ireland. We do not intend to continue the discussion of the Amendment any longer, and we are willing to take the Division at the earliest possible moment; but we must certainly express our disappointment that this, and recent Amendments of this character, which guard against the abuse of the Act, without in any way diminishing its force as against crime and criminals, have not been accepted by the Government. We trust that the Government will deal more reasonably with the other Amendments which we shall have to propose, or we may be compelled to discuss them at even greater length than the present.

Question put.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): The Amendment which I am about to propose has for its object to provide that the offences mentioned in the 3rd sub-section and committed in any part of Ireland; that is to say, the offence to taking part in any riot or unlawful assembly, and the other offences named, may be tried summarily. I think the Amendment sets out in the plainest and briefest terms the object I have in view. This is an extension of the Crimes Act to all Ireland, and it exempts the Government from the necessity of proclaiming any part of the country in order to punish offences against public order, and, stated in those terms, I cannot see why the Government should have the slightest objection to my proposal. I recommend the Amendment to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the ground that it will save him from the necessity of proclaiming the district, because he will be able to send to the Resident Magistrates at Belfast at once, and they will then try summarily those cases of public disorder which so frequently disgrace that part of Ireland. Coming from the North of Ireland, where I have lived all my days, and representing the district in which I was born, I would appeal to the Committee to consider for a moment the position of the majority of the people of Ulster, who are said to possess all the franchises and rights of British subjects. By the process of historical events in Ulster, all the large farms are in the hands of Protestants, the old race being in the occupation of farms of small size and value only. It is well known that when riots occur in the district the trials which afterwards take place are of such a character that, after 15 years' experience as a lawyer, I am able to say that it is only in cases where it would be perfectly scandalous, if it were not done, that justice is obtained. It is idle to talk about justice not being done, and the disagreement of juries in the West of Ireland, because whatever has been done there in that respect has been initiated by Orange juries in Ulster. What I want the Government to do is to state that when this particular offence of holding unlawful assemblies and rioting occurs, that the offenders may be tried in a summary way, without the stigma of proclamation being put on the district. I know that some hon. Members think that the Amendment will have a prejudicial effect on meetings held in the South of Ireland; but to this I answer that the distinction between a proclaimed district and an unproclaimed one is the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 14, after "commit," insert "an offence mentioned in sub-section (3) of this Clause anywhere in Ireland, or shall."—(Mr. O'Doherty.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Amendment which the hon. Member has moved, and still more that which he put on the Paper, is no doubt a large extension of the Bill as originally drafted, and we ourselves would have been unwilling to depart from the wording of the Bill as laid down. But we are willing to admit that there are some reasons on the side of the Amendment, and with certain qualifications, we shall be prepared to accept it. The hon. Member in moving the Amendment has somewhat altered its scope, but I think that in so doing he has not improved it. As it originally stood, it referred to all classes of offences analogous in their kind to that mentioned under sub-section (a). By the Act of 1885, passed to amend the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, it was made an offence in England to obstruct a constable or peace officer in the execution of his duty; and, under these circumstances, I should prefer, if the hon. Gentleman has no objection, that he should move his Amendment in its original form, and the Government, with the qualification I have alluded to, will be willing to accept it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): We cannot at all accept the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, inasmuch as the form in which my hon. Friend placed his Amendment on the Paper was entirely owing to a clerical mistake. If the right hon. Gentleman will accept the Amendment in the form in which my hon. Friend proposed it, the matter is settled; but certainly we shall oppose any extension of it beyond the limits which he proposes, and if the right hon. Gentleman does not feel in a position to accept it as proposed, I would strongly advise my hon. Friend to proceed with it.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I think it is clear that there has been a misapprehension on the part of the hon. Member, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will alter his position with regard to the Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We do not, of course, wish to take advantage of a misunderstanding on the part of the hon. Member; and I will not press the view which I first laid before the Committee. We are willing to accept the Amendment as moved by the hon. Member.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Chance), I rise to move that the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland upon sworn information shall be obtained before any prosecution is instituted under this section. I do not think that the Government will allege that if the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland is necessary in the case of the offences under the 1st clause it is not equally necessary under the 2nd clause. It would be a monstrous thing if this Bill were to be put in operation by any irresponsible person in Ireland; and, therefore, in order to prevent any improper use of this sub-section by the Legal Authorities, I think it should be incumbent on them to do what they will have to do under the 1st section—namely, obtain the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland before proceedings are instituted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 15, after "may" insert "the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland upon sworn information being first obtained."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The effect of this Amendment would be to require the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland for a number of proceedings which could be otherwise instituted by the individuals themselves, and entail an excessive and unnecessary amount of work upon him. This proposal would have the effect of introducing an anomaly into the clause which is a thing that from the first we have endeavoured to avoid. The Amendment is, therefore, objectionable on every ground, and the Government are unable to agree to it.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I cannot follow the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the cases under the clause are cases usually dealt with summarily; because this is a new and extraordinary jurisdiction, the application of which depends on the proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant. I admit that it would be undesirable to prevent any private prosecutor from exercising his right of bringing his case forward. I would, therefore, ask whether the Government will accept the Amendment in an amended form so as to limit its operation to prosecutions instituted by constables and Crown officials? We desire to prevent constables and others hatching up bogus cases by providing that the Attorney General for Ireland shall satisfy himself that there are grounds for the institution of proceedings under this clause.

Mr. HOLMES: It would not be possible for the Attorney General to exercise direct control over all the prosecutions which may take place; but I point out that we should be responsible to Parliament for those undertaken by the Crown officials. The Government are unable to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member; but he would, of course, be within his right in taking the sense of the Committee upon it.

Mr. CHANCE: I understand that the Attorney General for Ireland claims to exercise a negative control in these cases, on the ground that it would be impossible for anyone to exercise a direct control over them. The right hon. and learned Gentleman admits that it is his duty to exercise control, and what we propose is to make that control effective. I hope the Government will allow us to take a Division, not upon this Amendment, which I admit is informal, but upon the Amendment in the altered form which we think desirable.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "sworn information." — (Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That those words stand part of the proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

Further Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to add at the end, "in all prosecutions initiated by constables or Crown officials." — (Mr. Chance.)

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland being first obtained in all prosecutions initiated by constables or Crown officials' be there inserted."

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The objection to the argument of the Attorney General for Ireland is, that he is applying to this question the principles of ordinary law, as if the ordinary law applied to the whole of Great Britain. He said that the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland could not be obtained, because it is the function of every individual to be at liberty to prosecute, but our argument is that the House of Commons has entrusted to the Government abnormal powers which would not be entrusted to a Government anywhere else. We say, if you have this power given to you, do not let any private individual put the machinery of the Act in motion. The Government have asked for these powers; they have said we cannot govern Ireland without them. For my own part, I do not think those powers should be given, but we are giving them, and we contend that they ought not to be exercised by ignorant and prejudiced persons in Ireland; and there are many ill-tempered persons there who will be only too ready to make use of the Act for vindictive and revengeful purposes. Thus much with regard to the general principle of the Amendment; but we have now to consider it as amended. The hon. Member for Kilkenny asks that, in cases where the Crown officials prosecute in Ireland, the Attorney General for Ireland shall take the direct responsibility for the proceedings. Certainly, if what the Attorney General for Ireland has stated be true, this Act is much more dangerous than we anticipated. The right hon. and learned Gentleman now declares that the Act will be put in force so often that no one individual will be able to be responsible for all the prosecutions which will take place under it. That is a statement which we must read by the light of common-sense; we must recollect that he has the assistance of a very able lawyer, whose only misfortune is that he sits for no Irish constituency. But I am perfectly aware that, if the Government will give fees to Irish barristers, they can always command a large amount of legal talent in Ireland. There is, in fact, no difficulty in the way of the Law Officers obtaining any amount of legal assistance in that country. Now, if this Act is to be put in force to such an extent that the Attorney General for Ireland cannot be responsible, and that the Solicitor General cannot be responsible for the prosecutions which are to take place; if they are not in a position to control the working of this Act, then I ask the Committee to consider whether it is safe to allow every constable in the country to assume a responsibility which the Law Officers of the Crown shrink from. This is an abnormal Act which is against the liberty of the subject; but if the Government are to have it, at least let them be responsible for its administration. I am aware that the Attorney General for Ireland is not a responsible Minister in the highest sense of the word, and that he is not directly responsible for his own acts in connection with this Bill; but he is, at any rate, a far more responsible person than an ordinary constable would be, and if we had this Amendment inserted in the Bill we should be able to attack the Government and get any particular case investigated much better than if we had to go against an ordinary constable. That is one view of the case. It is a Party view no doubt; but it is in accordance with the practice of making the highest officials responsible. I will take a case in my own district. We occasionally have there a constable who wants to come into collision with the National League—I will not mention his name—but you are going to give that man an enormously increased power, which will enable him to institute prosecution after prosecution, and to be placed in a position to cause a great and unnecessary amount of annoyance to decent people. Of course, the Attorney General for Ireland can step in and quash his action at any moment he pleases; but it is one thing for the Attorney General for Ireland to make himself responsible for a prosecution in the first instance; and it is altogether a different thing for him to step in afterwards and put an end to a prosecution that has been begun. I believe that if you were to introduce this Amendment you will reduce greatly the number of prosecutions which would otherwise take place, and not only that, but you will reduce the amount of irritation which exists in Ireland. For my part, I cannot see why the Amendment should not be accepted. We, however, who are advocating it, are in an unfortunate position, because, at the present moment, there is no one on the Treasury Bench but the Law Officers, and, therefore, I think this point should be referred to again a little later when the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) and other Members of the Cabinet are here, for it is an Amendment of such importance that it should be considered fully by the responsible Members of the Government before it is rejected. The only reason given against the Amendment by the Attorney General for Ireland is that by rejecting the Amendment he will be saved a great deal of trouble. I think at least we should continue to debate this matter until some Member of the Government comes in to overrule the opinion of the Attorney General for Ireland. With regard to the contention of the Attorney General for Ireland that it would be impossible for him to deal with all the prosecutions that will take place under the Act, I venture to say that it would be a positive benefit to the country if we were to raise the remuneration of the Law Officers of the Crown to meet the increased amount of work that would result from the Attorney General for Ireland having to issue his fiat before any prosecution is instituted; because, by the means we have suggested, the country would be spared the cost of many useless prosecutions.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): There have always been two classes of criminal prosecutions; first, that of indictable offences, which are tried before a jury; and, secondly, those offences which are summarily disposed of by the local magistrates. In the first case, the public have always had the protection, that, before any prosecution is instituted or carried on by the Crown, the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland should be obtained. In the case of all indictable offences, which are tried at Quarter Sessions or at the Assizes, before the Crown prosecutes informations are submitted to the Attorney General for Ireland, and he endorses them either for prosecution or no prosecution. In the second class of cases, which are tried summarily, the public have no such protection. Then comes in this Act which makes indictable a number of offences which were not so before; and the Government say that they ought not to be tried by jury, but transferred to the jurisdiction of the Resident Magistrates. Well and good; if that be so, the question we ask you is this—having transferred the jurisdiction in these cases to the Resident Magistrates, why should you not preserve to the public the protection which they have always had? We say that if you allow these cases to be dealt with summarily, you should, at any rate, provide that those who institute the prosecutions should, first and foremost, get the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland. I cannot imagine anything more reasonable than that, and I am amazed at the ground on which it has been refused. The Attorney General for Ireland has admitted our case. He has admitted that in the case of indictable offences for which there are prosecutions the public hitherto have had the protection which I have pointed out—namely, the protection that, before the resources of the Crown are placed in the hands of any private individual to institute a prosecution, the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland has always been necessary, that the informations in the case are submitted to him, and that it is for him to say whether the Crown should institute prosecutions. Is there any reason, especially when you hand over these enormous and important classes of cases to the jurisdiction of Resident Magistrates, why that protection should not be preserved to the public? I respectfully submit that there is no reason. What does the Attorney General for Ireland say? He says that if you do this you will deprive private individuals of all right of initiative. My hon. Friend (Mr. Chance) has met that argument by offering to alter his Amendment so that it shall not apply to the cases of private individuals. But, at any rate, apply it to the cases in which prosecutions are set in motion, not by private individuals, but by police constables and other local officials, who, although they may act with the best motives, are more or less officious, and have the strongest inducements to be officious. I do not think anything more reasonable than that which is asked in this Amendment could be proposed. Surely the Government ought to do something to prevent the misuse of the powers conferred by this section. I have already drawn attention to the fact that there are classes of cases of a non-agrarian and non-political character, in which it would be monstrous to set these powers in motion. Granted that the powers of this section are necessary in the case of agrarian or political conspiracies; but these are conspiracies of a totally different character. I know that in the city which I represent, charges of conspiracy have frequently been made in connection with the Cork butter trade. Would it not be monstrous if a prosecution of this kind were instituted in a matter of no conceivable political or agrarian tinge? In cases of that kind, it would be in the power of the local Resident Magistrate or police constable to take away the trial of any case from the constitutional tribunal, from the petty jury in which jurisdiction has always hitherto been vested, and hand it over to the Resident Magistrates, though not the smallest reason of a valid character could be urged. We do ask that we shall not be absolutely at the mercy of the local tyrants to whom the Government will hand over the administration of this Act; we do ask that we shall have some protection against the action of constables or officious local Resident Magistrates. Let us have some authority in whom we can place some reliance. Goodness knows, the Attorney General for Ireland is not the official exactly whom we would ourselves choose if we had absolute discretion in this matter, and could set up our own authority; but, at any rate, he is the best we can propose in a matter of this kind, and it is a monstrous thing, when we propose that the authority to set the powers contained in this great section in motion should be the Irish Attorney General, the Government should say—“Oh! the Irish Attorney General has too much to do; his great mind is so much occupied by questions of State, he cannot condescend to these petty transactions. He has too much to do to bother himself with the question whether or not a prosecution shall be instituted under this section.” That, I say, is a monstrous attitude to take up. We are all aware that there has been a controversy latterly about the salary of the Irish Attorney General, and we know the Irish Executive has been in great conflict with the English Treasury on the subject. I understand they have stopped the right hon. and learned Gentleman's fees in cases of a non-contentious character; the Attorney General for Ireland, therefore, would not be paid for anything of this kind; but it is impossible to suppose he would be affected by such a sordid consideration as that. I regret the attitude the Government have taken up upon this clause—that they should attempt to run the clause through Committee without any Amendment at all, is a most unreasonable position to take up; and if it is persisted in, I am fully persuaded it will not tend to facilitate the passing of the Bill.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): The Irish Attorney General, in the course of his remarks, stated that there was no necessity for this Amendment, because, in the case of any of these prosecutions, he would always have the power to interfere and put an end to the prosecution if he thought that the prosecution was an unfair one. Now, that assumes on the part of the Attorney General for Ireland that he will have to look into the details of all prosecutions under this Bill; and, if that assumption be a correct one, surely it would be less trouble, and it would be a saving of time, if he were to intervene previous to the institution of the prosecution, instead of in the course of the prosecution. Now, Sir, the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Maurice Healy) seems an exceedingly strong one—namely, that the fiat of the Attorney General for Ireland has been necessary in these cases up to the present time, and that by this clause you are depriving the public of the protection which they have hitherto had. The main object of this Amendment is not so much that the Attorney General for Ireland shall grant his fiat for all these prosecutions, but in regard to those initiated by the police. The initiation of prosecutions by the police of Ireland has always been a danger to good Government in Ireland. You put a prize before the police in order to induce them to accumulate prosecutions on their own initiative; it is in proportion to their activity in getting up prosecutions that they look to reward. I can give an example which will show both sides of the question. A policeman in my own district admitted, in the course of a conversation with me, that an inducement was held out to him to support these prosecutions. He told me that if he were not active in the course of his duties he would not get the promotion that others who were active in the initiation of prosecutions would get. There are a number of policemen in Ireland who take a different view—who have, more or less, sympathy with the people. One of them actually apologized to me for having to carry out work which was put before him. He felt that the work that he had to do was unfair and unjust work; yet that, if he did not work in an active spirit, as the authorities called it, he would be deprived of the position he held. Now, this inducement to the police to initiate prosecutions is, as I have said, one of the dangers of the present time, and it would be a still greater danger under the operation of this Bill. If the Attorney General for Ireland is to interfere with prosecutions during their progress, what difficulty can there be in his looking into a case before a prosecution is started?

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I am sure that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had considered this Amendment in all its bearings, he would not have put his foot down in so determined a manner against the Amendment. What is the meaning of this Amendment? It is to step in, as a buffer, between the people of Ireland and that which is admittedly the curse of all administration whatever—namely, the meddlesome official. If the Attorney General for Ireland could only be brought to believe that this Amendment would keep him out of a great deal of hot water in the House of Commons, he would accept it. There is no doubt in the world that the spirit which actuates subordinate officials in Ireland is to make themselves as obnoxious to their neighbours as possible. Every time an official interferes under this clause, and makes himself obnoxious, the right hon. and learned Gentleman will hear of it in this House. He himself admits his responsibility for all the prosecutions, and yet he rejects an Amendment which, if accepted, would prevent him considerable annoyance. Now, the Attorney General for Ireland says it would be impossible for him to exercise such control as this Amendment asks him to, and yet in the same breath he leads the Committee to believe that he is going to exercise an effective control over every prosecution as soon as it is initiated. Why not step in in the beginning and stop the mischief before it has commenced at all. Surely prevention is better than cure. I should like to know on what argument he is going to rely. Is it that he has not time to attend to this matter, or is it that he is going to attend to it? Local officials will be sure to interpret this Act as being an Act placed in their hands to be worked with as much officiousness as possible. Most frivolous excuses they will give for bringing charges against people; and, therefore, we want the Attorney General for Ireland to say that these officials shall not on their own motion enter into prosecutions, unless he, or some of his legal assistants, shall have first inquired into the facts and given his fiat. If subordinate officials, like police constables, are allowed to initiate prosecutions under this clause, you will have the very thing which this Act is designed to stop—namely, disorder and crime. Wherever you have popular irritation you will have popular retaliation in some form or other. My hon. Friend the Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance) has very properly withdrawn that portion of the Amendment which would seem to prevent private individuals initiating prosecutions. He does not quarrel with the right of private individuals in this direction; all he wants to do is to take away the right of initiating prosecutions from subordinate officials. I think that the Attorney General for Ireland must upon reflection admit the justice of our case.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I hope the Government will agree to this Amendment, because it is simply to prevent the Irish people being placed at the mercy, not of the Castle Authorities, but of the police of the country. The provisions of this Act will be harsh enough if it is to be enforced by the proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant, by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, and by other high officials in Dublin Castle; but harsh as these provisions will be, the action of the local constabulary under this measure will be at least ten times as objectionable, because what does it mean if this Amendment is rejected? It simply means that the power is handed over to the constabulary in the different districts proclaimed to take proceedings against people for having committed offences named in the Bill. I cannot conceive why the Attorney General for Ireland refuses to look into these cases before proceedings are taken, and I can only judge his refusal to mean that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to encourage the police in Ireland to commence all sorts of obnoxious proceedings without any reason whatever. It is a very well known fact that under previous Coercion Acts the constabulary have instituted proceedings against the public, and have been the means of getting people imprisoned who had done nothing at all. I remember very well that, under the Coercion Act of 1881, police constables, in a part of Ireland I know very well, went about openly boasting that they would have, sooner or later, certain men put in prison against whom they had some ill-feeling or spite. A number of men were imprisoned under the Coercion Act of 1881, who were imprisoned simply on the initiation of a police constable in the district who had some ill-feeling against them. So, I say, unless some check, such as is provided by the Amendment now under discussion, be put upon the police in the different localities of Ireland, you will have instituted all sorts of prosecutions against people simply out of pure personal ill-feeling or spite. We know very well that the police are not at all a popular body of men in Ireland. To some extent the police have been boycotted. The police have been in the habit of attending evictions and carrying out other dirty work, and, therefore, the people regard them with feelings of dislike. The police in return cherish towards the people, to a great extent, feelings of spite and of temper; and, therefore, I say that when they get this power in their hands we shall find them paying off what they consider to be old scores. Now, Sir, I am perfectly certain that the effect of the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Chance) would be to lessen, to a very great extent, the prosecutions which will take place in Ireland in proclaimed districts under this Act. Surely, Sir, whatever the intentions of the Government may be, it cannot be their deliberate intention to have these prosecutions multiplied all over the country. They cannot desire to see the police institute prosecutions without proper reasons and without proper motives, and yet the refusal of the Attorney General for Ireland to give an undertaking that he himself will inquire into prosecutions before they are commenced would lead one to suppose that that is their wish. I cannot conceive a more reasonable request to make to the Government than that where they are determined to proceed by summary jurisdiction against people, they will not take proceedings until the Attorney General for Ireland, or, if not the Attorney General for Ireland, until some other high authority in Ireland, shall have satisfied himself that the proceedings are just, and that the person ought to be proceeded against. I consider this is a most important Amendment, and I do think that it is a very bad sign indeed that no Member of the Cabinet thinks it worth his while to attend in his place to listen to the arguments which we bring forward upon matters such as these. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has in a sort of way replied to this Amendment; but he has not given any good or sufficient reason for his refusal to inquire into these cases before they are proceeded with by the local police. We know very well, and even the Attorney General for Ireland himself must admit, that in very many cases the police are very ignorant men, and in a great many other cases are men filled with prejudice and bigotry. All we ask, therefore, is that the people should be protected against wanton proceedings by the police under this section, and I ask Liberal Members above the Gangway, is it an unreasonable thing for Irish Members to ask that if, under this section, summary jurisdiction is to be put in force, it shall not be put in force upon the sole authority of local constables, but that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, or some such authority, shall satisfy himself as to the justice of the proceedings before they are initiated? I think we have a right to get, if not from the Attorney General for Ireland, from the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), or some other Member of the Cabinet, an answer to this demand we are making. I ask the First Lord of the Treasury what possible objection the Government can have to such an Amendment as this, which does not interfere with the just working of the Bill, which cannot at all interfere with the intentions of the Government under the Bill, but which will simply provide that the people shall be protected against wanton proceedings, that the people shall have the satisfaction of knowing that before proceedings are taken under this clause the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has inquired into the matter, and that they are not being proceeded against simply and solely upon the authority of the local constable. I can assure the Committee that if there is ground for the feeling in Ireland that this Coercion Bill is to be administered, not merely by the high authorities of Dublin Castle, but by the prejudiced and bigoted policemen of the country, the difficulty of the task which you profess to have before you—namely, to make the country peaceable, will be rendered all the greater. I ask the First Lord of the Treasury to say what objection the Government have to give the undertaking that before proceedings are taken under this clause the Attorney General for Ireland, or some high official of the law in Ireland, shall satisfy himself that the proceedings are just, and so protect the people from the wanton action of the police.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I believe my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland gave a full answer to this Amendment, and it therefore becomes my duty, Mr. Chairman, to claim to move "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put accordingly, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 145; Noes 219: Majority 74.—(Div. List, No. 154.)

THE CHAIRMAN: I consider that the decision just come to by the Committee practically disposes of the next Amendment. The same remark applies to Amendments No. 7 and No. 8.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Will you allow me to say, Mr. Courtney, that I did not intend to move No. 7; but I may raise the question embodied in the Amendment when Clause 3 is disposed of.

THE CHAIRMAN: In respect to Amendment No. 8, it appears to be open to the remark that nothing is provided to finish the sentence. I do not see that there is any supplementary Amendment; therefore I can hardly conceive that this can be accepted as a reasonable proposition.

MR. ANDERSON (Elgin and Nairn): Did I understand you, Mr. Courtney, to rule out of Order Amendments No. 10 and 11?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes; I think they are open to the same remark as the Amendments immediately preceding them.

MR. ANDERSON: I beg to move, page 2, lines 15 and 16, to leave out "a Court of Summary Jurisdiction under this Act," and insert—

"A Special Commission Court consisting of three Judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland (other than the Lord Chancellor) appointed by the Lord Lieutenant to try offences under this Act in any proclaimed district."

This Amendment is to omit from Clause 2 the tribunal which the Government propose to decide upon the very important questions which are to be submitted to it under this Bill. It will be observed that Clause 2 says—"may be prosecuted before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction under this Act." Now, that Court of Summary Jurisdiction is defined by Sub-section 6 of Clause 11, which states that—

"The Court of Summary Jurisdiction shall within the police district of Dublin metropolis, be a Divisional Justice of that district, and elsewhere by two Resident Magistrates in Petty Sessions, one of whom should be a person of the sufficiency of whose legal knowledge the Lord Lieutenant shall be satisfied, and the expression 'Resident Magistrate' means a magistrate appointed in pursuance of the Act of the Session of the Sixth and Seventh year of the reign of King William the Fourth, chap. thirteen, intituled 'An Act to consolidate the laws relating to the Constabulary Force in Ireland.'"

Well, bearing in mind the very important offences—which it is not necessary for me to refer to—that are dealt with in this 2nd clause, offences of great importance, involving, as they do, the power of this Court of Summary Jurisdiction to inflict punishment of six months' hard labour, I think it might be expected that we should have, under this Bill, a Court of similar importance to Courts in other parts of the United Kingdom which deal with cases of a similar kind. It will be understood that there are Courts in England to deal summarily with offences; but it is known to the Committee that the Sheriffs of England are men of trained experience. They are practically trained lawyers, and many of them are perfectly qualified, from their education and experience—and I want to impress upon the Committee their practical knowledge in dealing with matters of this kind—to deal, not only with these summary cases, but with much more important legal matters. In England you have nothing of the kind which is suggested in this clause of the Bill. Well, everybody knows that where you give powers of this kind you have a Court far superior to anything of the kind suggested in this Bill. I wish to call the attention of the Committee to a Return which has been presented to the House of the Irish Resident Magistrates who are to dispose of these cases. I would give the Committee one or two instances of the kind of Court that will have to deal with these important subjects, as appears by this Return. I take the first case. I suppose a Court composed of Mr. S. F. Carew, a magistrate of Tipperary, receiving £675 a-year, whose qualification is that he has served—

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I rise, Sir, to a point of Order. I understand, Sir, that the hon. and learned Gentleman is not disputing the Court, or discussing the question whether the Court to try the offences under this measure should or should not be a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. What he is discussing is whether the Court shall consist of two Resident Magistrates or of three Judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland. Well, Sir, it seems to me that it would be more in Order to discuss that question when we come to the 6th sub-section of Clause 11.

THE CHAIRMAN: No doubt, the constitution of the clause can be discussed under Sub-section B of Clause 11, which deals with the constitution of the Court of Summary Jurisdiction; but it seems to me perfectly competent for the hon. and learned Member to move to amend this clause, which says that persons guilty of certain offences, which are specified, may be prosecuted before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. Under this Act, it seems open to him to move to substitute that Court he suggests for the Court of Summary Jurisdiction provided for in the section.

MR. ANDERSON: I understand from your ruling, Sir, that I am entitled to proceed. I do not know how I can put before the Committee the object of my Amendment unless I show that the Court of Summary Jurisdiction provided under this section is incompetent to try these cases. If the right hon. Gentleman opposite will bear with me for a few moments, I will be very brief. For the purpose of illustrating my case, I will take a Court composed of two persons in this Return as an instance of what may happen. Here you have Mr. S. F. Carew, who, as I say, is in receipt of a salary of £675 a-year, and whose previous avocation is stated to be this—"has served in the 8th Hussars, and afterwards in the Militia." Well, I assume he will be put as presiding Judge or senior Judge of these two, the other being Mr. Buckle, whose previous avocation was "resident country gentleman and honorary secretary of the Tipperary Agricultural Society." Now, do let the Committee for one moment, in all seriousness, consider the character of a Court composed of these two gentlemen, which will have to dispose of these serious offences. Why, even with regard to cases which are subject to summary conviction in this country, where the powers are much less than are given here, nothing so absurd as that which you now propose takes place, because upon the ordinary English bench of magistrates, though, no doubt, you have gentlemen who belong to agricultural societies, you have, at the same time, to keep them right with regard to law and criminal practice, a magistrate's clerk. But in the Court you propose you have nothing of the kind. You have a retired officer of Hussars assisted in his judgment upon these important matters by a gentleman whose sole experience, or whose principal experience, has been in connection with some agricultural society. Let me take another case for the purpose of illustration. Lower down in the list we have the name of the Hon. W. F. Forbes, and he appears to have served in the Grenadier Guards, and to have been in the Commission of the Peace for eight years. He, of course, is a person of some small training; but I cannot think that his best coadjutor on the bench will be Mr. Preston, who appears to have been an Army tutor in receipt of £425 a-year. You have a retired officer of the Grenadier Guards and an Army tutor forming a Court which is to deal with these matters. So much for the qualification of these persons mentioned in this Return, who I maintain are wholly unfit to discharge the duty, in spite of the clause that I understand the Government are willing to put in the Bill, declaring that one of the magistrates taking part in these proceedings is to have a certain legal qualification. But there is this still more important matter which, to my mind, goes to the whole root of the question—namely, that these magistrates are to deal with what are practically political offences. There is no doubt of that. Questions connected with Boycotting and connected with the agrarian agitation will come within their jurisdiction, and those questions are of a political nature. It will be observed by the Committee that all those magistrates hold their office during pleasure; and it must be borne in mind that one of the most dangerous engines which a Government has for dealing with political offences are magistrates or Judges who hold office during pleasure, because these magistrates and Judges, of course, know perfectly well that it is to their interest to deal with political offences in the direction and in the way that the Crown desires, because, if they do not, the Crown may at once dismiss them. The Members of the Committee may probably know that this very question led to one of the greatest Constitutional struggles that ever took place in this country—namely, that upon the question of the appointment of the Judges. As the Committee knows, the Judges under the Act of Settlement were appointed and retained in office in the manner I have referred to, and the result was that the Crown did not hesitate to use the Judges of the Superior Courts as instruments for political oppression. I will read two or three lines from Hallam on this subject. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members opposite, I am sure, have not read Hallam for many years, and one passage of his, a very short one, will, I am sure, do them a deal of good—

"It has been the practice of the Stuarts, especially in the last years of their dynasty, to dismiss Judges, without seeking any other pretence, who showed any disposition to thwart the Government in political prosecutions. The general behaviour of the Bench had covered it with infamy. Though the real security for an honest Court of Justice should be found in its responsibility to Parliament and to public opinion, it is evident that their tenure of office must, in the first place, have ceased to be precarious, and their integrity be rescued from the severe trial of forfeiting the emoluments upon which they existed."

That is the exact position of these

magistrates. I desire to point out that it is most dangerous for this Committee to adopt the proceedings which were followed in the reign of William III. in appointing officers at pleasure to undertake these duties. So much for that. Now I wish to say a word as to what I wish to propose to introduce into this Bill. I do not know whether the Government look with any sort of favour upon my Amendment. I cannot help hoping that, inasmuch as they have all cited the Act of 1882, they will look with favour upon this Amendment, because it was the very provision inserted in that Act for the purpose of providing for the trial of offences created by that measure. The tribunal which I propose is a tribunal of three Judges of the Supreme Court in Ireland, who are not ex-Lord Chancellors. Well, we shall have some excuse for the Government—I hope not, but I fear we shall—to the effect that that would be too important a tribunal to try the cases; but I do say this, that when you are dealing with offences of this character, involving, as they do, political questions, one of our first acts ought to be to select a tribunal which, if possible, should possess the confidence of the country. I do not say that there are often to be found tribunals such as I suggest. Perhaps the tribunal is too large, and that two Judges will do. Perhaps some might like to have an English Judge. By all means, if you like to have an English Judge upon the tribunal, have one. I do not think any expense ought to be spared by the Government for the purpose of giving these people who are to be prosecuted for what they do in proclaimed districts a tribunal in which they have confidence. That is my first contention. Now, three Judges—or perhaps two, for two would do, and I should be glad to hear what the Government have to say upon that point—will be able to bring to bear upon the matters submitted to them extensive experience and great legal knowledge, and from the nature of their positions and their independence, will be able to decide the cases submitted to them without fear or favour. We may depend upon their being thoroughly impartial—at any rate, if we cannot depend upon getting such a body as I propose in Ireland, we can send over English Judges or Scotch Judges for the purpose. You have lately had an instance of an English Judge going to Ireland and doing admirable justice. I cannot help thinking that that is a precedent that should be followed, and I venture to suggest that my proposal is one that deserves the very serious consideration of the Committee. I bring it forward, not as an idle Amendment, but as a serious one, which goes to the root of the clause; and I ask Her Majesty's Government to give it serious consideration. I trust they will accept it. I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, lines 15 and 16, leave out, “a Court of Summary Jurisdiction under this Act,” and insert “a Special Commission Court, consisting of three Judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland (other than the Lord Chancellor) appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, to try offences under this Act in any proclaimed district.”—(Mr. Anderson.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I confess that one sentence in the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech surprised me very much. There were many things which surprised me in his speech, but that which surprised me most was his telling us that he brought forward his Amendment seriously. I can hardly believe, in spite of his assurance, that that was the case. His speech consisted entirely of two parts, in one of which he criticized the suggestion of the Government, and in the other of which he proposed his alternative suggestion. Now, with regard to his alternative suggestion, it is sufficient to say that to construct a special tribunal of three Judges, even if they were Irish Judges, to go about from place to place trying these cases would not only be extremely cumbersome and costly, but would absolutely prevent that rapidity of action which is one of the chief points we hope to gain by introducing the provision for summary jurisdiction. So much for the actual substantive suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I will now devote a few words to the consideration of his criticism upon our proposal. He has to-night attacked, not for the first time in these debates, the Resident Magistrates to whom are to be entrusted the summary jurisdiction under this Bill, and his chief reason appears to be—now the well-worn one—that many of these Resident Magistrates have been soldiers. Now, I have already told the Committee, and I again repeat, that though we are anxious, and have shown our anxiety in the Bill, to take precautions that one of the two Resident Magistrates who have got to decide these summary cases shall be a person of competent legal knowledge, we are not prepared to admit that the best class from which to choose the greater number of these magistrates is that of lawyers. We are not of opinion that you get the pick of the legal profession at the salary which Parliament allows a Resident Magistrate; but we do believe that you will get most competent and efficient men to fill these posts from other classes at the salaries you are prepared to pay, and in that contention we are supported by experience. The hon. and learned Gentleman has brought out stores of ancient learning as to the English judicature—

MR. ANDERSON: No, no.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Gentleman read out some common-places from Hallam; but the hon. and learned Gentleman, if he had appealed more to experience and less to maxim, would have found that Ireland owes a great deal to the Resident Magistrates. They have for many years administered, impartially and effectually, summary jurisdiction, and whoever has been responsible for the government of Ireland will acknowledge that these gentlemen are well worthy of the confidence of this House.

AN HON. MEMBER: Worthy of the confidence of the landlords.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Now, the hon. and learned Gentleman has suggested that, as these magistrates are removable at pleasure, therefore they will be willing slaves of the Executive in dealing with these offences.

MR. ANDERSON: No; may be.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Now, there are two answers to that argument, and the first is, that political offences are not punishable under this Bill; and the second is, that no example can be produced where even a suspicion, or even the first breath of a suspicion, has existed in the mind of any competent or impartial Judge that the Executive of this country has ever for one moment dared to interfere with the action of one single Resident Magistrate acting in his judicial capacity. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, I challenge the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. John Morley), who was himself connected with the Irish Government, to get up in this House and contradict that statement. He did not serve under Lord Spencer; but he will probably join with other Leaders in this House, not the least with Gentlemen who now sit below the Gangway, in saying that Lord Spencer's management of Ireland during his Viceroyalty was, not only a courageous management, but an impartial one. Well, by far the majority of those whom Lord Spencer appointed to be Resident Magistrates were not lawyers, but belonged to the class upon which so much contempt has been poured by the hon. and learned Gentleman. I think that Lord Spencer would join with me in regard to the character I have given of the Resident Magistrates; and the right hon. Gentleman opposite will also, I believe, join with me in saying that, whatever other charges may be brought against these gentlemen, it cannot be said of them that they have ever shown themselves slaves to the Executive Government when they have been called upon to exercise the duties of Judges. We, taking advantage of experience, and following the example of previous Governments, have entrusted the duty of judges to the Resident Magistrates, and we feel confident that we can do so safely. Under the circumstances, it is impossible for us to accept either the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman or any other Amendment of a similar character, which would have the effect of displacing the Resident Magistrates from the position I have pointed out.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): By the very words of the Statute these Resident Magistrates are under the orders and the control of the right hon. Gentleman who has just resumed his seat. But the right hon. Gentleman has challenged us to give any example where the Executive has interfered with the conduct of Resident Magistrates in their judicial duties. Well, I can give him such an example. I can give an example of a Resident Magistrate who was dismissed from his appointment for declining, first, to discover evidence against prisoners, and then to send them to trial. I can supply the right hon. Gentleman with the name of the gentleman I refer to on his undertaking that he will not use the information against that person.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I must confess I was perfectly astounded to hear the right hon. Gentleman opposite make the statement he did as to the Resident Magistrates not being under the control of the Executive. Can it be possible that the right hon. Gentleman has so soon forgotten the letter published in the newspapers by that very experienced Resident Magistrate, Mr. Clifford Lloyd, who gave a most graphic description of the work at the Castle, and spoke of the telegrams which poured in from magistrates, asking for instructions as to what they were to do? It will be said that in the most of these cases the applications were to know what they were to do in their administrative capacity as servants of the Executive; but there is no doubt in the world that a great deal of the instructions issued to them had regard to what they were to do in their judicial capacity. The difficulty in the matter is that it is preposterous and absurd to say that you can get men to separate in their own minds when they are acting, on the same day, in a judicial and in an executive capacity, the influence which the Government has a right to exercise upon them in the one case, and the independence they are to exercise in the other. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland threw out a challenge to us to mention individual instances in which the Executive had interfered with the action of a magistrate. If I had had notice of the challenge I could have given dozens and dozens of such instances; but on the spur of the moment I will recall a few instances which recur to my mind without taking the trouble to refresh my recollection. There is the case of Father Fahy. The magistrate sitting in a judicial capacity, or the Crown Solicitor acting for the Crown in that case, stated either that instructions had come, or instructions were expected to come, from the Castle ordering the magistrate to refuse to put the defendant under rule of bail. What did that amount to? Why, that instructions had come, or were coming, from the Castle ordering the magistrate to commit this gentleman to prison, which he accordingly did, Father Fahy being committed to prison for three months. There is another instance which I will give in order to show the confusion which arises in the minds of magistrates—a very natural confusion—between their duty as police officers of the Executive Government and their duty as Judges. A case occurred in which I was partly interested a short time ago in the County of Cavan. It was a case in which two or three men were brought before Captain McTiernan, of Enniskillen, by no means a bad specimen of his class, a reasonable and fair minded man, the sort of magistrate of which we have unfortunately too few in Ireland. Well, the men were sentenced to a month's imprisonment. They appealed to the County Court Judge at Cavan, and when the appeal came up for hearing Captain McTiernan sat on the Bench beside the Judge, Mr. George Walters—a thing which it is customary for such gentlemen to do when they have occasion to attend the County Court. I have the account of this from some one who was sitting in the Court when it occurred, and saw the whole thing. Captain McTiernan was sitting on the Bench beside the Judge; some one said it was not right or decent that he should take his seat on the Bench to hear an appeal from his own judgment, and Captain McTiernan at once said that he thought that remonstrance very fair, and left the Bench. But what did he do? He went down and sat beside the Crown Prosecutor, and prompted him in the case against the prisoners. Well, I put it to the Committee whether that is the kind of man—and I have pointed out that he is an admirable specimen of his class, and one of the fairest minded Resident Magistrates we have—I put it to the Committee whether he is a gentleman to which cases under this clause should be brought, and whether he is a gentleman who is likely to discriminate very fairly between the influence the Government exercise upon him in his administrative capacity, and that they seek to bring to bear upon him in his judicial capacity. In view of all the people in Court whose confidence in the law it was so desirable to maintain, this gentleman quitted the Bench, and went down and sat by the Crown Prosecutor, and gave him suggestions and promptings in the conduct of a case which was an appeal against his own decision. There cannot be the slightest doubt that magistrates do seek for guidance and advice from the Executive as to their action as magistrates sitting in Court, and that they are led by that guidance and act slavishly upon it. They are guided by the Executive as to the severity of their sentences, and as to their general behaviour as magistrates. I endorse the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that many of the best magistrates in Ireland are not lawyers. I have one man in my mind at the present moment, a man promoted by Lord Spencer to the head of the Metropolitan Police in Ireland. He was in the district of East Mayo when I was there, and a more excellent magistrate, and one in whose knowledge and justice one could more thoroughly rely, does not exist in the United Kingdom. I would not hesitate to trust him, but this gentleman is a rare exception amongst the Irish magistrates, and what I would suggest is this. Of course, there are considerable objections which naturally occur to the sending of Judges of the High Court round the country as Courts of Summary Jurisdiction; but what objection could there be to sending round for this purpose the County Court Judges of Ireland? Why not make these Courts Courts where two County Court Judges could sit? I ask hon. Members is that not a fair offer of compromise? These Irish County Court Judges are gentlemen who are largely paid for their services. They are gentlemen whose time is by no means fully occupied—that is notorious in Ireland. There are, therefore, a number of them at nearly all times of the year with leisure. They are acquainted with the localities. They enjoy, to a much greater extent, the confidence of the people in their impartiality than do the magistrates, and they are not under the direct control of the Castle. They bear much more than the magistrates the character of Judges, and, as I have said, they are in the habit of visiting the localities and they know the local circumstances. I ask, therefore, what reasonable objection can be taken to constituting the Court of County Court Judges in place of the proposed Court of Resident Magistrates? Such a Court would command more respect, and would certainly have a better knowledge of the law than the one proposed. I think that, under all the circumstances, if this detestable clause is to be passed, the best Court we could get in Ireland, taking everything into consideration, would be a Court of two County Court Judges to be nominated by the Lord Lieutenant according to the circumstances of the time. Surely that is not an unreasonable request. The powers asked for under this section are of a most extraordinary and extreme character, and it is not an unreasonable request to ask that the men who are to administer the great powers given by this section should be men who, in the minds of the people, are divorced from police duties, and will have some of the characteristics of Judges of the land, and who will not be men liable to be removed, or liable to be promoted, or liable to have promotion refused them, according as they serve the purposes of the Executive. They will not be men, the very best of whom think it right and proper to go down from the Bench when an appeal from their decision is being heard, sit beside the prosecuting counsel, and prompt him in the management of the prosecution. They will not be men whose minds will be confused between the ideas of their duty as executive officers and judicial functionaries, as occurred in the case I have mentioned. These Resident Magistrates are not the class of men who ought to have the powers which will be conferred by this clause, especially when we have men in Ireland ready to our hand—a class of Judges who, at least, know the law and cannot be removed at the will and pleasure of the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. A. J. Balfour) has called me to witness, not, I think, with any particular relevancy, because he himself admitted that I was not responsible for the Government of Ireland under Lord Spencer. The short time I was at the Irish Office there was no summary jurisdiction of this kind in operation. My experience in the matter must, therefore, be thoroughly valueless. So far as my opinion goes as to the expediency of entrusting this summary jurisdiction to Resident Magistrates, the right hon. Gentleman could not have done me the honour to listen to what I have said on two occasions on previous stages of this Bill, because I then referred to the very passage from Mr. Clifford Lloyd's letters which my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo has drawn attention to. Mr. Clifford Lloyd pointed out that during the administration of the Crimes Act of 1882, there was constant communication between Dublin Castle and the Resident Magistrates, not only upon their executive and police duties, but, to use Mr. Clifford Lloyd's own expression, on matters "relating to the maintenance and execution of the law." I cannot doubt for a moment that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland will not dream of putting direct pressure upon the Resident Magistrates in the execution of their judicial work. I ventured, in some remarks that I made earlier, to say that I would not so readily trust the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Assistant Secretary (Colonel King-Harman). With his strong prejudices, and his strong views about Irish administration, he would be very likely to misapprehend the limits of his position; but that is not the point. The point is not whether a direct pressure will be put upon the Resident Magistrates by the right hon. Gentleman. What we submitted and urged was that there would be inevitably present in the minds of the Resident Magistrates the complexion which their actions would wear in the minds of their official superiors, who have in their hands their promotion, their removal, and their whole material prospects. On those grounds, therefore, I agree with much, not with every word, but with the spirit of what has been said as to the impropriety of entrusting these powers to the Resident Magistrates. I do not know that the right hon. Gentleman was very judicious in enlarging upon that particular aspect of the case. On the particular point now before the Committee, I regret that I cannot agree with my hon. and learned Friend who moved the Amendment. It seems to me that this Amendment is an utterly impracticable one. I cannot see how you are to have three Judges moving up and down Ireland dealing with every case that every constable may think fit for this summary jurisdiction to be exercised upon. I think it would not work, and the remark made by the hon.

Member for East Mayo showed that he equally with his Friends sees the objections which are to be made to this proposal. The hon. Member for East Mayo suggests, as I understand him, that there should be two County Court Judges to whom you should entrust the exercise of this summary jurisdiction. But this is not the place for discussing that proposal, because there is upon the Paper an Amendment in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler), to the effect that these cases shall be heard before two Resident Magistrates, a County Court Judge, and a Chairman of Quarter Sessions. You will find that Amendment on page 27 of the Paper of Amendments. The suggestion of the hon. Member for East Mayo can, therefore, be very well discussed when we come to Clause 11. In the meantime, I only wish to say that I, for one, should not be able to support the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Anderson), and I am sure he would not be ill-advised if he were to withdraw it.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I rise for the purpose of suggesting to my hon. and learned Friend that he should be satisfied with the discussion which has taken place upon his Amendment. It is an Amendment for which we should be willing to vote; but we see the objections pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, and I would, therefore, suggest to my hon. and learned Friend that the question mentioned by him would be more fitly raised on the Amendment to which the right hon. Gentleman has just alluded. I would suggest that he should withdraw his Amendment just now, and raise it at perhaps a more practical and opportune moment.

Mr. ANDERSON: I certainly desire, after what has fallen from hon. Members on this side of the House, to withdraw this Amendment. In withdrawing it, I would express a hope that, before the question comes on again for discussion, Her Majesty's Government will have carefully considered whether it would not be possible for them to give way upon the point upon which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland said at the outset the Government would not be prepared to accept "any" Amendment. In requesting leave to withdraw my proposal, I would urge the Government, in the meantime, to consider the question seriously.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I now rise for the purpose of moving the rejection of Sub-section 1 of Clause 2 in the following terms:—

"Any person who shall take part in any criminal conspiracy to compel or induce any person or persons either not to fulfil his or their legal obligations, or not to let, hire, use, or occupy any land, or not to deal with, work for, or hire any person or persons in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation; or to interfere with the administration of the law."

The discussion this evening has been, to some extent, anticipated by the discussion that took place last night on the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt). At the same time, I think there are many considerations which it was impossible then to bring before the Committee, and I will, therefore, venture to raise the question somewhat more broadly, at the same time avoiding going over the ground my right hon. Friend has so fully and ably explored—namely, the whole question of the Law of Conspiracy. In the statement I shall make on this sub-section, I fully accept the statement made by the English Attorney General—namely, that the section as now drawn is not intended to create any new crime. What it does is this—it proposes to withdraw a large class of the most important cases from the superior tribunals of Ireland—namely, the Judges of the land—and to submit them to the lowest tribunals in Ireland—namely, the Resident Magistrates—a tribunal which, I venture to say, is wholly incompetent, whether from legal knowledge or otherwise, to deal with these important subjects. At present, as the hon. Member for East Mayo said last night, the jury stands between the tenants of Ireland and the Law of Conspiracy which it is proposed to deal with under this section. That is really their protection from the Law of Conspiracy as laid down in the section, and as it would be administered by the tribunal to which it is proposed to refer these questions. Now, it is absolutely certain that if this section passes in its present form, it will be impossible for the tenants to combine together to resist unfair rents. That, I take it, will be absolutely certain under the clause as it now stands, and that object is undoubtedly the object of the section, for we have been told by Lord Salisbury in "another place" that the object of the Bill is to prevent combinations of tenants, and this is the section of the Bill in which it is proposed to effect that purpose. I have no doubt, for my part, that this is the most important section of the whole Bill; and I have no doubt that if the landlords of Ireland should obtain this section, they would willingly abandon almost all the other sections. As a matter of fact, the section is for enabling the collection of rents by a new process—namely, by the enforcement of the Criminal Law—by a process indicated in the section—before the inferior tribunals of Ireland. I would venture, in the first place, to point out that this is an entirely new provision. It has not been included in any other Coercion Act that I know of since the beginning of the century. I have searched through 86 Acts, and I do not find a single one of them that contains a clause at all analogous to the one now under consideration. It cannot be said that the circumstances are different, and that, therefore, a new kind of remedy is required, for it has been very usual, in past years, whenever periods of great agricultural distress and depression have occurred, or whenever there has been great want arising from bad harvests, or whenever the prices of agricultural produce have fallen, it has been very usual for combinations of tenants to take place with the view of obtaining reductions of rent. And the same combinations have taken place in respect of other legal obligations, such as tithes. I find that in the year 1832-3 there was a general combination against the payment of tithes and of rent, yet in one of the most severe Acts ever passed through this House, the House inserted an Amendment to the effect that no district should be proclaimed under that Act by reason of tenants refusing to pay tithes, showing how unwilling the House of Commons was at that time to allow a Coercion Act to be used for the purpose of enforcing contracts and civil obligations. I find that in 1846-7—when, as all hon. Members must be aware, there was very great distress throughout Ireland, and when there were almost universal combinations amongst tenants for the purpose of obtaining reductions of rent, the Coercion Act introduced by Sir Robert Peel—and which was the cause of his fall—contained no clause of this nature for endeavouring to enforce the payment of rent by coercive measures. And the Act of the following year, passed by the Government that succeeded Sir Robert Peel, likewise contained no provision of this kind. But, perhaps, the most interesting instance is that of the Coercion Act of 1881, because hon. Members will perfectly recollect that there were then combinations against rent very similar to those which have occurred recently; and there had been a prosecution instituted against Mr. Parnell and five other Members of Parliament under a Conspiracy Law similar to that it is sought to enforce in the section before the Committee. The jury had refused to find a verdict in that case, and, therefore, the whole question was fully under the cognizance of Parliament at that time. But yet the Act of 1881 contained no provision at all analogous to that we are called on to pass—no provision for the purpose of enforcing the payment of rent. Therefore, I say that all precedent is against a clause of this character. For my part, I think it an extremely dangerous precedent that we should endeavour to enforce the payment of legal obligations or the collection of rent by a penal process such as is now proposed under this sub-section. As to the law as it applies to this section, I will venture to say only a few words. I do not propose to delay the Committee at any length by going once more into the question of the introduction of the word “criminal.” For my part, with such legal knowledge as I am able to bring to bear on the subject, I do not think that the introduction of the word at all affects the question. It does not modify the meaning of the word “conspiracy.” But I would venture to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he can produce any case of conspiracy now punishable by law which will be excluded if this clause passes with the introduction of the word “criminal?” If he can do that, I will give up the case. But if he cannot produce any such case, he must agree that the word is surplusage. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland endeavoured to draw a distinction between conspiracy as applied to contracts of labour, and conspiracy as applied to contracts for the payment of rent; and, if we look solely to the English Law on the subject, I think there is a great deal to be said for that distinction, for I find it laid down by very high authority—by no less an authority than Mr. Wright, who was quoted by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General last night, who is, perhaps, the highest authority in the country on the subject of conspiracy, and who now occupies the position of the Attorney General's devil; and, therefore, I presume, is consulted. [Cries of “Order, order!”] I believed the post is a very well recognized one, and a very important one, and that it generally leads to promotion to the Bench at an early date. I think that the fact that this Gentleman holds that high position is some sanction for the statement that he is an authority on these matters. His book is well recognized as being the highest authority on the subject of conspiracy. I find that in that book on conspiracy, Mr. Wright drew a very great distinction between cases of conspiracy under the labour laws in respect to contracts for labour, and combinations, and other kinds, and especially of tenants in respect of rent. After summing up all the authorities on the subject, Mr. Wright says that on the whole he strongly favours the view that combinations to injure a private person, otherwise than by fraud are not, as a rule, criminal, unless criminal means are used; and, he goes on to say, that in none of the cases are there decisions to be found antagonistic to this proposition. Throughout the whole of this part of his book he practically lays down the conclusion that although before the Act of 1875 combinations of workmen to break contracts of hiring were criminal, and under the Criminal Law; yet that other combinations such as those which the Committee are now considering are not criminal, and are not conspiracies. That, according to the best opinions I have been able to ascertain, is the state of the case with regard to English Law. But I am bound to say that the Irish Law is very different on the subject; and I must say I am surprised that the Chief Secretary for Ireland should have coached up on English Law without reference at all to Irish authorities on the subject. I am surprised that the Irish Attorney General did not answer the appeal made to him last night, and say whether he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for Ireland, and with the proposition laid down, that combinations of tenants to break contracts for rent, as held by the Law Courts in Ireland, are not conspiracies within the Criminal Law. Now, the whole matter was gone into at very great length in the very well-known case of the Queen against Parnell, to which I have already adverted, and the decision of Judge Fitzgerald, now Lord Fitzgerald, goes far beyond anything that has been held in the English Courts in recent times. It lays down this proposition, which goes to the very fullest extent of the proposition laid down by the Judges in respect of combinations of labour in the cases I have already referred to. The ruling of the Judge, or rather the charge of Judge Fitzgerald, goes the fullest length in saying that any combinations of tenants for the purpose of breaking their contracts and endeavouring to obtain a reduction of rent, are conspiracies according to the law in Ireland; and, therefore, are indictable and punishable as such. The clause under consideration appears to me to have been framed almost identically upon the words used by Judge Fitzgerald in the case I have referred to. In that ruling Mr. Justice Fitzgerald said—

"If the tenant withholds his rent that is a violation of the right of the landlord to receive it, but it would not be a criminal act in the tenant though it would be a violation of a right; but if two or more persons incite him to do that act, then their agreement is by law an offence."

That appears to me to frankly admit the whole of the proposition I have been contending for—namely, that under the Irish law, if not under the English law—and, I admit, that in theory there is no distinction between the law of the two countries—practically a combination of tenants to obtain a reduction of rent from their landlord, and, in the meantime, not to pay rent is a conspiracy and indictable as such. And, accordingly, by this clause all these cases would be dealt with under the section now proposed, and the tenants would be liable to be summoned before the Resident Magistrates and sentenced to imprisonment for six months with hard labour.

Now, I would venture to put this case to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. Suppose a number of small tenants in Ireland, say 100, found themselves in great difficulty with regard to their rents in consequence of severe agricultural depression or failure of crops, or great fall in prices. Suppose they are unable to pay their full rents. I will not say they have no property whatever out of which to pay, but I will assume for a moment that they could not pay their full rents without selling off their stock on the farm, and supposing a number of these tenants go to the landlord and ask him for a reduction of rent and he refuses to make a reduction, and suppose four or five of the leading men amongst them summon a meeting of the smaller tenants and ask them to make common cause together, and say to the landlord they will not pay their rents unless some reduction—say of 25 per cent—is made, I want to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether, under the ruling of Judge Fitzgerald, such a case as this would not be held to be conspiracy and punishable under the law as it now stands? I ask him whether it would not come within the meaning of this section in spite of the introduction of the word "criminal." It seems to me that under the ruling of Judge Fitzgerald there cannot be a doubt that combinations of tenants of this kind, thoroughly spontaneous combinations, and not combinations forced upon them from outside, which may not have taken place under the Plan of Campaign, but which may have occurred on the motion of the tenants themselves to obtain reductions of rent, are now indictable under the law as laid down by Judge Fitzgerald—indictable as conspiracy, and as such, coming within the section now before the Committee. If it is not so, I hope the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland or the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for England will state distinctly that such a case will not be included within the section, and how it is that it will not come within the section. It appears to me that if that be the state of things, and that if it is intended that cases of that kind can be dealt with summarily under the section now proposed, such a proceeding will be most monstrous. In my opinion, the only way in which small Irish tenants of this kind can really protect themselves under agricultural pressure, and the conditions which now exist in Ireland, is by combination of that character, and that they are just as much entitled to protect themselves by combination in this way as labourers in England are entitled to protect themselves against unfair dealing on the part of their masters. The Act of 1875 expressly met the case of breaches of contract, and in my opinion, breach of contract as regards labour is on the same footing as a breach of contract to pay rent. The payment of rent is not sanctioned upon any higher basis than contracts for labour in England. Now, Sir, what is proposed under the section which is now before us is not, as I have already said, to alter the law, but to alter the procedure of the law, to take the cases away from the jury and the Judges who are now the protection of the tenants of Ireland, and submit them to this inferior tribunal of magistrates. It is not only in Ireland that juries are a protection to people in this position, but it is the same in England. If the law, as laid down by Lord Fitzgerald, be sound, the Welsh farmers who are protesting against the full payment of tithes are just as much guilty of a conspiracy—of a combination, which is an illegal conspiracy under the Conspiracy Law—as tenants in Ireland, and the only thing that saves them from being prosecuted is the fact that no jury in England or Wales would by any possibility convict. I would ask, would any human being suggest that a case of this kind should be dealt with by an ordinary magistrate—would anyone justify the withdrawal of cases of this importance from the tribunals of the country and submitting them to the ordinary tribunals of magistrates? That is what you are proposing to do in Ireland—to draw these complex cases from the Judges of the land and to submit them to the ordinary and most inferior magisterial tribunals in Ireland—to men who, in my opinion, are totally incompetent to deal with the really difficult and dangerous questions that would come before them. There is one other point I wish to bring under the attention of the Committee, and that is the question of the evidence that would come before these magistrates in these cases.

These cases of criminal conspiracy involve the most difficult description of evidence that can well be conceived. Lord Fitzgerald, in the charge in the Parnell case, pointed out the extremely vague manner in which the charge might be substantiated; he showed that it was not necessary that you should bring before the Judge evidence to show that the persons charged with conspiracy were actually concerned, man to man, for the purpose of making it a conspiracy; but he said you might infer there was a conspiracy, though the parties had never seen or communicated with one another. I advert to that in order to show how extremely dangerous and loose this law is, and to put the jurisdiction of these cases into the hands of men such as the Resident Magistrates in Ireland, appears to me to be, not only dangerous, but wholly unjustifiable. I venture to say, therefore, that this clause which is now before the Committee is one that ought not to be allowed to pass. By rejecting this clause the Committee would not in any way be altering the law of the land. Under the law as it stands, these cases would go before the Superior Courts; but under this clause it would be transferred to Resident Magistrates. Now, I want to ask the Government why they cannot be satisfied with allowing these cases to remain with the Superior Courts with the protection they have in other parts of the Bill as to the change of juries and the change of venue? Surely it is wiser that cases of this difficulty should be dealt with by the Superior Courts. It seems to me to be fraught with the utmost danger to commit such cases to the tribunal of Resident Magistrates. There is only one other point I would note, and that is that when the Indian Code was under consideration, it was decided by the Commissioners who framed it that nothing should be inserted with regard to conspiracies of this kind, and the Indian Code at this moment does not make it a penal matter that there should be a combination of tenants not to pay their rents. I am informed by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) that, not long ago, a strike occurred in Bengal, and the question then arose whether the Government should not pass a law to penalize combinations of this kind, to impose penalties against the persons offending, and after great consideration the Government came to the conclusion that it would not be right to enforce contracts of the kind by resorting to penal law, and nothing was done in the matter; the two parties were left to fight it out, and I am told that they were able to settle the matter amicably. And, further, when the Criminal Law of this country was under consideration in 1878, I find there was no provision in the Code then proposed to Parliament similar to the clause now before us; combinations and conspiracies were not dealt with by that Code at all. The framers of that Code came to the conclusion that it was not wise or right to enforce civil contracts by penal laws of this kind. The fact is that this branch of the law—Judge-made law—has never come under the review of Parliament at all. When it has come before Parliament, as in the case of the Labour Laws, it has been condemned. I have now only to conclude by saying that, in my opinion, any attempt to enforce civil contract by penal law, as in the Law of Conspiracy, and which is proposed to be enforced by the clause before us, is unwise and unjust in the highest degree, and I believe that the full right of combination is equally as important to the small tenants of Ireland as to any other class of people in this country.

Question proposed, "That the words 'any person who shall' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The right hon. Gentleman, in commencing his observations, said this question had been substantially discussed very fully last night, and he went on to say that he would, as far as possible, endeavour to avoid reiterating the arguments used on that occasion; but he did not carry out that intention. I have not heard any new argument or any new statement in the whole of his speech, although I followed as closely as I could all his arguments. I do not intend to follow the right hon. Gentleman in all he has said, and I would not have intervened in the debate but for the circumstance that he appealed to me and referred to another appeal made to me yesterday evening. I may at once explain that my view agrees with that of the Attorney General for England; we discussed the matter together, and my view of the law agreed with his. If I was asked for any further statement of what the Law of Conspiracy is, I would quote a passage from the speech delivered by my hon. and learned Friend last night. In my opinion, the right hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension if he thinks there is any difference between the law of Ireland and that of England on this point. I can assure him, from my knowledge of the matter, that the law is the same both in Ireland and England. It may be possible, in the course of a long Charge delivered by Lord Fitzgerald in the case of Parnell, to quote a sentence here and there which might support some other proposition; but the real point in the charge was that the circumstances proved in the case supported the indictment, and that will be plainly seen if you look at the nature of the case. It was the case of a criminal conspiracy, and if the right hon. Gentleman looks into the evidence he will see the conspiracy was, by a combination of persons by fraud and illegal means, a condition of things which we wish to touch by this clause. As I have stated, I entirely concur in what the hon. and learned Attorney General has said, and, so far as I am aware, there is no difference between the law in England and Ireland upon this point. We wish for a speedy remedy when the combination is criminal; and, therefore, the Government ask the Committee to pass this clause. One argument that the right hon. Gentleman brought forward was that this particular clause was a novel one. It is not a novelty in law, but we introduce a new procedure, because we believe the circumstances of the time require that there should be a new procedure, which is a very different thing. As we have had such a long discussion upon this question, not only last night, but on previous occasions, the Committee will excuse me from saying more than to reiterate again that I entirely agree with what has been said from this Bench, and that, so far as we are concerned, we consider that the matter has been fully discussed.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I do not intend to follow the Attorney General for Ireland through this matter, but I wish to approach, for a moment or so, the consideration of what is really proposed by this clause—namely, for the first time legislating for the people of Ireland in regard to combinations. Now, Sir, my contention is this—that this is an extremely dangerous power to leave in the hands of magistrates. It is a power which has hitherto been reserved by the law of this country, and by the law of Ireland, for the cognizance of the Superior Courts. What is conspiracy? I must confess, in the first place, I am entirely at a loss to understand what the meaning of the words are “any criminal conspiracy;” and I respectfully invite the Attorney General for England to define, as I think it is his duty to do, what the meaning of those words “criminal conspiracy” may be—that is to say, what is the meaning for the purpose of giving them effect in this clause? I understand the Law of Conspiracy to be that it is the endeavour to compass any illegal object by what may be perfectly legal means, or to compass some legal object by illegal means; and what those illegal means may be, and what the object may be, has hitherto been, and still is by the law of this country, a matter entirely for the arbitrament of the learned Judge before whom it is taken. [Cries of “Divide!”] I really think this is a matter of too much importance to be dismissed in such a cavalier manner. I am not trespassing upon the Committee unduly; and, as a matter of courtesy, I think I may ask the Committee to listen to what I have to say. I wish to point out, as briefly as I can, that this clause really proposes to enact something that is entirely foreign to the law of England. It proposes that—“Any person who shall take part in any criminal”— combination, because “criminal conspiracy” is meaningless—

“conspiracy to compel or induce any person or persons either not to fulfil his or their legal obligations, or not to let, hire, use, or occupy any land.”

Now, I say it would be absolutely impossible—and I challenge the Attorney General for England on this point—to invent any indictment in which it would be possible for any verdict of guilty to be found whereby a person was charged for the purpose of combination with another for the purpose of letting land, unless, indeed, it could be shown—[Cries of “Divide!”] I do not wish to speak for the purpose of throwing the discussion over to-day, although, under any circumstances, it would be so, as it is too important a matter to be disposed of now, but what I wish to point out is that hitherto the whole force of the law of the country, as it has been interpreted by the Judges, has been to limit the Law of Conspiracy, and there is no case throughout the whole of the recorded decisions in our Law Courts where any persons have been found guilty of such a conspiracy as that which is proposed under this section. Very much was said upon this subject in the debate which took place on the Trades Union Act of 1875, and in 1875 the late Mr. Forster, in supporting that Act, pointed out how extremely undesirable it was to have any legislation by which a person could be punished for combining for the protection of his own trade interests, and pointed out, with regard to combinations, that where it was in order to obtain an increase of their wages they were perfectly legitimate combinations to enter into, and that it would be highly improper for the Legislature to interfere. I wish to put it precisely on the same grounds whether this is not in an identical position, that it would be equally within their rights, in the view of Mr. Forster, that persons should combine for the purpose of reducing their rents? There was a case reported many years ago where two men were prosecuted for a conspiracy in favour of exclusive dealing. In that case the men were tried and convicted. That is a subject with which this clause deals. In a later case Lord Ellenborough pointed out that that case could not, as it ought not, have been decided upon that ground, but it was decided entirely upon the ground of the action against the trade, and, therefore, against combinations. [Cries of “Divide!”] I will stop before the quarter to 6 o'clock is reached, if that is what hon. Gentlemen opposite are anxious about. This clause constitutes not merely a criminal offence which has hitherto been known to the law, but it provides a particular measure—a particular means—by which this criminal offence should be dealt with; it provides that it should be dealt with by two magistrates, and I submit that is a tribunal absolutely unfitted for dealing with the delicate question of deciding whether or no some proceeding—it may be innocent or otherwise—is, in the eyes of these particular magistrates, a conspiracy. That should be left to the Constitutional authority of this country, and I venture to say it is inexpedient and unconstitutional to provide such a course of procedure.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I claim to move, "That the Question be now put."

THE CHAIRMAN: Last night I pointed out that the discussion of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was rather anticipating the discussion which would come on under this particular clause, and could only be permitted on the understanding that it would have some effect on the discussion upon this clause. Having regard to this fact, and the circumstance that the characteristics of the combinations to be dealt with will be discussed upon the Amendment of the hon. and learned member for Hackney (Sir Charles Russell), I think it right to put the Question. The Question is, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly.

TELLERS.

Lefevre, rt. hn. G. J. S.
 Morley, A.

THE CHAIRMAN: Since the last Division a quarter to 6 o'clock has been reached; and the Question is that the words "any person who shall" stand part of the clause. The construction of the Standing Orders is not without difficulty; but, on the best consideration I can give them, I am of opinion the Question must now be put.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland), (seated, and with his hat on) said: On a point of Order I wish to draw your attention to the words of the Standing Order, No. 4—

"At a quarter before Six o'clock on Wednesday the debate on any Business then under discussion shall stand adjourned to the next day on which the House shall sit; after which no Opposed Business shall be proceeded with."

Now, I would respectfully call your attention to the fact that the Division which you are now about to put is a Division put in spite of the protest of 143 Members of the House; and, therefore, Mr. Courtney, I respectfully submit that comes under the head of Opposed Business.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no debate under discussion; the debate is closed, and this is part of the Business that must be completed.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Gentleman cannot speak unless he has something to add.

COLONEL NOLAN: I have something to add. My contention is that no opposed Bills should be taken after a quarter to 6 o'clock, and that this House cannot suspend the Standing Orders unless we are unanimous.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. and gallant Gentleman is not adding anything to the matter.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid) (seated, and with his hat on): Mr. Courtney, on a point of Order I wish to ask if this Division lasts over 6 o'clock, and the House stands adjourned by the Standing Order at 6 o'clock, how will it be competent for Mr. Speaker to take the Chair and adjourn the House?

THE CHAIRMAN: We have not reached that point.

The Committee divided.

The Tellers having come to the Table, to report the numbers to the Chairman—

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (seated, with his hat on as before): Mr. Courtney, are you now entitled to take the numbers, in view of the Standing Orders No. 1 and No. 2 of the House? The first is—"That the House do meet every Wednesday at 12 o'clock at noon for Private Business, Petitions, Orders of the Day, and Notices of Motion, and do continue to sit until 6 o'clock, unless previously adjourned."

The second one is—

"That when such Business has been disposed of, or at 6 o'clock precisely, notwithstanding there may be Business under discussion, Mr. Speaker do adjourn the House without putting any Question."

Now, Mr. Courtney, I call attention to the fact that it is seven minutes after 6 o'clock, and accordingly, Sir, it is a breach of the Standing Orders of the House that any Business should be taken now.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am informed that upon many previous occasions Divisions have begun before a quarter to 6 o'clock, and have not been reported until after 6 o'clock.

The Tellers then reported the numbers:—Ayes 223; Noes 143: Majority 80.—(Div. List, No. 156.)

Committee report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Committee do sit again To-morrow."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of Order, and ask if it is competent for the right hon. Gentleman to fix the Committee on this Bill at seven minutes past 6 o'clock, in face of the Standing Order that Business should finish at 6 o'clock? I may say, Mr. Speaker, a point has been raised which I submit is not the same. I raised the point when the Chairman of Committees was in the Chair, that it was not competent to take the Division; but the hon. Gentleman ruled there were several precedents in favour of the result of the Division, which began before a quarter to 6 o'clock, being taken after 6 o'clock. I submit we are now dealing with an entirely different matter, which is not the result of a Division, but the fixing of a Committee of a Bill, and with great respect I state that it would be an utter violation, and without precedent, of the Standing Orders.

MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the hon. Gentleman, I have to say the Business of the House has been protracted beyond 6 o'clock in consequence of proceedings before a quarter to 6 o'clock, and the proceedings afterwards have been consequential upon that action. My presence here, after 6 o'clock, is in consequence of that protracted Sitting. At the termination of the day's proceedings it is quite competent for the right hon. Gentleman to move that the Committee sit to-morrow.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): If it would be competent for the House to make an Order now, after 6 o'clock, it would on a point of Order be competent for us to debate it.

MR. SPEAKER: No point of Order arises upon the Question put by the hon. and learned Gentleman; therefore I leave the Chair.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

And it being after Six of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

MIDLAND GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY OF IRELAND BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I wish to ask for the indulgence of the House while I call attention to a matter of Privilege in connection with this Bill. At any rate, if it is not actually a question of Privilege, it is, at least, a matter which ought to be brought under the notice of the House as something which may be considered gross misconduct. This Bill, about a fortnight ago, was before a Committee of this House, of which the hon. Baronet the Member for South St. Pancras (Sir Julian Goldsmid) was Chairman. The other Members of the Committee were the hon. Member for the Totnes Division of Devon (Mr. Mildmay), the hon. Baronet the Member for the Lewes Division of Sussex (Sir Henry Fletcher), and my hon. Friend the Member for Dublin. The Bill was promoted by the Midland Great Western Railway Company of Ireland, and among the opponents of it were the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company, of which Mr. Spaight is Chairman. At a meeting of the Limerick Harbour Board, of which Mr. Spaight is also Chairman, he is reported to have made some observations attacking the conduct of the Chairman of the Committee and the Committee itself, which I wish to bring under your notice, Sir, and that of the House, because I believe that the remarks made by Mr. Spaight, as Chairman of a meeting of shareholders, really amount to a Breach of the Privileges of this House. The remarks Mr. Spaight is reported to have made were to the following effect:—

"Mr. Grierson, the Manager of the Great Western Railway, gave important evidence, but he was not listened to. The Chairman (Sir Julian Goldsmid) absolutely turned aside, put his arms over the back of his chair, and affected to go to sleep. From the very commencement of the inquiry the Chairman seemed to have made up his mind on the question. He knew from the start that they had no chance, owing to the apparent bias of the Chairman."

The following statement is contained in a letter which has been published:—

"We complain that the Chairman of the Committee held and expressed such a strong feeling in favour of the promoters and against the petitioners, from the opening of the case, that everyone who listened to the proceedings was quite satisfied from the first day what the decision would be. Our opponents will, I think, admit that such was the general impression."

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is not entitled, in discussing a Private Bill of this character, to bring forward a matter of Privilege. A question of Privilege must be raised separately after this Bill has been disposed of, and not at the time of Private Business. I would ask, however, when the statements were made or published?

MR. COX: The speech was delivered on Monday, and the letter was published on the 9th of May. It was only last night that the paragraph in the newspaper article was brought under my notice, and therefore I have had no opportunity of consulting with you, Sir, as to the proper course of action to be taken. When the Order for the Third Reading of the Bill was read, I thought that would be the proper time for bringing the conduct of this gentleman under the notice of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: I should have been happy, if I had not been otherwise engaged at the moment, to give the hon. Member any advice on the subject. Perhaps the hon. Member will consult me after the Bill has been disposed of. The remarks of the hon. Member relate to a question of Privilege, and have no connection with the Question before the House, which is the Third Reading of this Bill; nor do they affect the passing of the Bill.

MR. COX: No, Sir; they do not affect the passing of the Bill. On the contrary, I am anxious that the Bill should pass.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I beg to move that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow. Hon. Members will then be able to have the Bill before them, and the question can be properly discussed. I think that would be the most convenient course to take.

MR. SPEAKER: As a point of Order, I have stated that it is not proper to debate a question of Privilege upon a Private Bill. Nor is it necessary to move the adjournment of the debate, because, if the hon. Member objects to the Bill, the matter must, in accordance with the Standing Orders, stand over.

MR. CHANCE: Then I do object.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): And I also.

MR. DODDS (Stockton): Then the Motion must stand over until tomorrow.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

OVER DARWEN CORPORATION BILL (by Order).

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to move the omission of Clause 112, and, in doing so, I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter which has been placed before us in the Report of the Committee which sat upon this Bill. The Bill originally gave power to the Corporation of Darwen to establish sanitary regulations in excess of the provisions of the general law. In 1885 a Special Committee of this House was appointed to consider the Police and Sanitary Regulations contained in certain Private Bills which had been introduced into this House; and the decision which that Committee arrived at was that, unless strong reasons could be assigned, no deviation should be allowed from the provisions of the ordinary law of the land. In regard to the present Bill, the Local Government Board have reported very strongly on some of the provisions contained in it, and asked that they should be amended. I believe that they have been amended accordingly, and, therefore, I do not propose to press the Motion which stood in my name originally—namely, that the Bill be re-committed to the former Committee with respect to Clauses 96 to 131, inclusive, which the former Committee have reported as containing Police and Sanitary Regulations in excess of the provisions of the general law; but I ask the permission of the House to move that Clause 112 be omitted from the Bill. Is it in Order for me to do that?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes.

MR. HOWELL: Then I ask leave to withdraw the Motion for the re-committal of the Bill, and to move the omission of Clause 112. Perhaps I may be allowed to explain that this clause is directed against processions of the Salvation Army.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I believe that the promoters have agreed to omit the clause to which my hon. Friend objects.

MR. HOWELL: I will only say that the powers contained in this clause are of a very exceptional nature; and, although they are intended to prohibit Sunday processions, and are specially directed in this case, I am told, against the Salvation Army, they may have a much wider application. I think it is a most undesirable thing that processions should take place on Sunday, and I am not in favour of them myself; but I think that if it is considered desirable by this House to put a stop to meetings and processions on Sunday it should be done by a Public Bill, and not by a clause inserted in a Private Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 112 (Processions on Sundays) be left out."—(Mr. Howell.)

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I hope I may be allowed to say a few words in regard to this Bill, and I promise that they shall be confined within the narrowest compass. I only wish to say, on behalf of the promoters, that they have no objection to withdraw this clause. I should not have said a word if my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester, who was Chairman of the Committee which inquired into the Bill, and upon which I had the honour to serve, had been present. This clause was carefully considered by the Committee, and we followed the precedent which has been set by former Committees of reporting to the House that the Bill contained clauses in contravention of the general provisions of the law, and in inserting in the Bill the clause to which exception is now taken. The House has itself created a precedent by sanctioning the same clause on the recommendation of the Committee in former years. I feel it right to say, however, both on the part of the Committee and on the part of the promoters, that there is no objection to the withdrawal of this clause on this occasion.

Question put, and negatived.
 Original Question put and agreed to.
 Bill, as amended, considered.
 Amendment made.
 Bill to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND) ACT, SECTION 8—FINE ON AN HOTEL KEEPER FOR EXHIBITING A POLI- TICAL BANNER.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Murphy, landlord of the Crown Hotel, Castleisland, County Kerry, was recently fined £2, in consequence of there having been, on the 24th April, on the balcony of his hotel a piece of calico with the words "God save Ireland" thereon; whether such prosecution was at the instance of the Irish Government; whether such prosecution was made in virtue of s. 8 of c. 38, 6 & 7 Will. IV., which enacts (inter alia) that on no occasion or pretence shall any flag, symbol, colour, or decoration be hung out of licensed premises, except the accustomed sign; and, whether this law has been, or is to be, universally enforced throughout Ireland?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: This publican appears to have been fined as stated. He had positively refused to remove the banner when directed to do so, and said that he would take the consequences. The prosecution was at the instance of the police, and under the provisions of the Statute quoted. This law has been enforced, and no doubt will continue to be so wherever and whenever the preservation of the peace demands it.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—VIOLENT CON- DUCT OF AN "EMERGENCY MAN" AT MINKSTON, CO. CORK.

Mr. HOOPER (Cork, S.E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, at a recent eviction of a tenant named Barrett at Shanbally, near Minkston, County Cork, an Emergency man named Denis Lynch presented a revolver at a number of women in Barrett's house though no resistance was being offered whether reports have reached him that Lynch was under the influence of drink; whether any Report has been received on the subject from the Constabulary; and, whether the authorities will order an inquiry into the case?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: It appears that Barrett was put out of a house in which he had acted as caretaker; and while the furniture was being removed, his daughter, a young girl, ran out and stated that Lynch had presented a revolver at her. The police who were on duty on the spot inquired into the case, and could find no grounds for the allegation. They also state that Lynch was not under the influence of liquor, and the authorities see no ground for ordering any further inquiry.

Mr. HOOPER: May I ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, if these allegations in my Question are substantiated on an affidavit, will he take any further action in the matter?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I did not gather the allegations were founded on an affidavit. If they are, of course I will make inquiries.

NATIONAL BOARD OF EDUCATION (IRELAND)—THE VACANT SEAT.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any steps have been taken to fill up the vacancy at the National Board of Education caused by the death of the Duke of Leinster; whether repeated representations have been made to the Government, complaining of the inadequate representation of the Irish Presbyterian Church on this and other public Boards; and, if the Government intend to avail themselves of the present opportunity to bring the Presbyterian representation at the Board of Education more in harmony with that of other Churches?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: Yes, Sir; the Government are taking steps to fill up the vacancy caused by the death of the Duke of Leinster on the National Board of Education. The Government are of opinion that the Irish Presbyterian Church is not adequately represented on the Board; and they will take the present opportunity of increasing the representation of that Body, if possible.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, BANTRY UNION.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether complaints have reached him that Constable Kavanagh, of Durras, at the recent election of a Guardian for the Glenlough Electoral Division of the Bantry Union, left a voting paper at the house of Timothy M'Carthy, Glenlough; whether he called for same voting paper, and, if not, why not; whether he left one voting paper each at the house of Ellen Kingston and Cornelius Brien; and, whether he returned two voting papers for each of these persons to the Returning Officer of the Bantry Union, to which their names were attached; and, if true, whether, at future elections of Guardians in the Bantry Union, the Government will see that the policemen entrusted with the distribution and collection of voting papers will act impartially?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: The constable stated that he called for the voting paper at M'Carthy's house, but it was in the possession of Patrick Arundel, one of the candidates for the election, who refused to give it up. With regard to the other part of the Question, I have already replied to that in answer to an inquiry put by the hon. Member on the 3rd instant. The Irish Government have no reason to believe that the constables did not act with impartiality.

MR. GILHOOLY: Can the right hon. and gallant Member say how it was he returned two voting papers for these houses?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, two papers were returned; but there were grounds for believing they were forgeries.

LAND ACT (IRELAND)—APPOINTMENT OF SUB-COMMISSIONERS.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Messrs. Gregory and Wilson, and Colonel Davys, have been appointed Sub-Commissioners under the Land Act; whether there are other ex-Sub-Commissioners whose past service has been longer than that of these gentlemen; upon whose recommendation Colonel Davys was appointed; and, whether the Land Commission has been consulted in these appointments, or its opinion obtained?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: Sir, I am aware that the three gentlemen named have been appointed, and it is quite possible that there are other gentlemen whose past services have been longer than theirs. In one instance this certainly is the case; but seniority cannot be regarded as the sole ground for consideration in making these appointments. The Government, however, cannot discuss the grounds on which they make their appointments, which are made with a full sense of their responsibility in the matter, and they endeavour to secure the services of the best available men. I may remind the hon. Gentleman that Mr. Wilson was one of a list of nine persons specially recommended by himself.

MR. LEA said, he did not send in any such list. He would remind the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that he had not answered the latter part of the Question.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: No, Sir; the Land Commission is not directly consulted upon these appointments.

MR. MAYNE (Tipperary, Mid): Is the right hon. and gallant Gentleman aware that Colonel Davys has had a serious dispute with his tenants, who have, within the last week, obtained large reductions in the Land Courts at Roscommon?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I am not aware, nor do I think it my duty to inquire into this matter.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS—THE TREASURY MINUTE.

MR. T. C. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the clause in the recent Treasury Minute respecting writers, which provides in special cases for the promotion of writers on the recommendation of the Heads of their Departments to the Lower Division, will be given effect to; whether the various Heads of Departments have already sent in their Reports, with the names of those writers whom they recommend for promotion; and, whether, in view of the fact that it is now nearly six months since the Minute was first issued, he can explain the delay in giving effect to the clause referred to?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said: In answer to the hon. Member, the Treasury Minute laid down that a limited number of copyists of admitted merit might be promoted to the Lower Division. It was not intended that any large number would be thus promoted; but the Heads of Departments have been asked and have sent in lists of names, which are being considered, and I anticipate that promotion will shortly be made of a limited number. It is not intended to increase the total number of Lower Division clerks.

DUNDRUM CRIMINAL LUNATIC ASYLUM—THE RESIDENT MEDICAL OFFICER.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many special inquiries into charges made against the Resident Medical Officer of the Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum have been held within the last five years; and, whether there is any objection to lay the several Reports relating to such inquiries upon the Table of the House?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: No special inquiries of the nature indicated have been held. There was a Departmental Inquiry held by order of the Government towards the close of 1881, and in the beginning of 1882, into a number of matters connected with the administration of the asylum, as to which the hon. Member was informed in reply to a Question put by him to the then Chief Secretary, on May 3, 1883. In 1885 there was an inquiry on the general operation of this asylum, and as to the advisability of structural additions and re-arrangement of buildings. As the hon. Member has been already informed, in reply to his former Question on this subject above referred to, Reports of this nature are regarded as confidential, and the Government cannot undertake to lay them upon the Table of the House.

Mr. T. C. Harrington

WAR OFFICE—ARMY MEDICAL OFFICERS.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can state why Army Medical Officers are placed on a footing with Departmental or non-combatant officers, and disqualified from reckoning time on half-pay towards promotion or retirement, in view of the fact that they are required by the Regulations to go under fire, and in time of war, do so?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): There are several reasons why medical officers do not count time on half-pay towards promotion and retirement, as combatant officers do. In the first place, the early voluntary retirement of a combatant officer is often an economy to the public, and the means of saving another officer from compulsory retirement at a comparatively early age. This does not apply in the Medical Staff, where there is no compulsory retirement before the age of 55, and it is desirable to retain trained medical officers as long as they continue efficient. Moreover, the retired pay of medical officers is on a more liberal scale than that of combatant officers.

METROPOLITAN POLICE FORCE—RE- TURN OF CONSTABLES DISMISSED AND REDUCED.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing the number of the Police Constables dismissed, and also the number reduced in class, and for what offences, during the time that Sir Charles Warren has been Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police Force?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: The Secretary of State has no objection to lay on the Table a Return showing the number of police constables dismissed, and also the number reduced in class, since Sir Charles Warren has been Chief Commissioner. That number has been below the average of former years. The Secretary of State does not think it will be expedient, in the public interest, to give a Return of offences for which constables have been dismissed or reduced. The Commissioner has, by Statute, the power to dismiss constables without assigning any cause. The Secretary of State will, however, be happy to give the hon. Member privately any information as to any particular case in which he takes an interest.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Will the hon. Gentleman make the Return divisional?

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: I will consider that point.

WAR OFFICE—REGIMENTAL BANDSMEN AT POLITICAL MEETINGS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that six bandsmen of Her Majesty's Hussar Regiment, quartered at Colchester, took part in uniform at a concert given by the Conservative Club in that town on Monday, 9th May; and, whether this was not contrary to the Regulations that are in force with regard to the presence of regimental bandsmen at political gatherings?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): It appears that the officer commanding did allow some of his bandsmen to play at a workmen's Conservative Club in uniform, as the meeting was merely social, and without any political significance. But he has been instructed not to allow the bandsman to take part in any concert without the permission of the General Officer commanding.

SOUTH AFRICA—ANNEXATIONS IN ZULULAND.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, What is the geographical limit of the Zululand that has been annexed, and does it include any part of Tongoland; is the annexation approved of by Dinizulu, Undabuka, Umnyamana, and the principal Chiefs of the Zulu people; and, will Zululand become a portion of Natal, or a separate Crown Colony?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): The Zululand which has been annexed includes all the Kingdom of Cetewayo, excepting what has been assigned to the new Republic. It does not include any part of Tongoland. The areas of the parts of Zululand are:—New Republic, 2,854 square miles; British Zululand, comprising the Reserve Territory and Eastern Zululand, 8,220 square miles. The new Republic is, therefore, little more than a fourth of the total area, whereas under the Agreement of August, 1884, the Zulus had practically ceded 4,234 square miles to the Boers; the difference, 1,380 square miles, has been secured to them by the friendly intervention of Her Majesty's Government. Dinizulu, Undabuka, Umnyamana, and the other principal Chiefs of Zululand, received favourably the intimation that Her Majesty's supreme authority and protection would be extended to their country. It is proposed to grant them pensions during their lives. Zululand will not be annexed to Natal—at all events at present—and will be administered as a separate Crown Colony for the benefit of the Natives.

DR. CLARK asked the right hon. Gentleman if he could inform the House as to the estimated cost to the Imperial Treasury of the new Crown Colony of Zululand?

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, the increase in the cost of administration was estimated at £6,037 a-year. The Government hoped to meet this in future years by a native hut tax, and by licences and imposts such as were now levied in the Zulu Reserve; but for the £5,000 of the current year it was not proposed to ask the British taxpayer to pay anything, because it would be met out of the Cash Reserve Fund, which had accumulated under the careful management of the Reserve. That territory would now become part of Zululand; and, therefore, it was fair to use the balance this year.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) asked whether a map of the country would be published?

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, that a map would be published with the Papers.

UNITED STATES—EMIGRANTS TO TENNESSEE.

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether complaints have reached Her Majesty's Government with regard to the position of emigrants who recently went out to Tennessee in connection with the Tennessee Coal, Iron, and Railroad Company; whether inquiry is being made into the circumstances; and, if so, whether the results of such inquiry will be made public; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will take any action in the matter, should the complaints prove to be well-founded?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): Inquiries on this subject are being made through the Home Office. Any further action will depend upon the result of those inquiries.

THE MAGISTRACY (ENGLAND AND WALES)—BOROUGH OF HANLEY.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that it is intended to increase the number of magistrates acting in and for the borough of Hanley; whether the selection of the gentlemen nominated has been made without the knowledge, consent, or approbation of the Town Council of that borough; and, whether, in view of the fact that the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses, under the corporate seal, have memorialized Her Majesty and petitioned the House of Commons to the effect that the suggested appointments would not conduce to the respect in which the Bench should be held by the inhabitants, he will advise the Lord Chancellor to take steps to obtain the concurrence in any selection for these important posts of the governing body most competent to advise as to the gentlemen best qualified in the esteem and confidence of those among whom they will have to administer justice? The hon. Gentleman said, he was informed that since the Notice was put on the Paper and subsequently to the presentation of the Memorials referred to, in spite of the protest of the Corporation, the names of six gentlemen had been added to the Commission of the Peace. Such being the case, he would not trouble the Secretary of State to reply to the Question.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: The hon. Member appears to have been under some misapprehension. On the 28th of April the Lord Chancellor gave the necessary directions for the insertion of additional names in the Commission of the Peace for the borough of Hanley. Before that time a letter was sent to the Town Council by the Lord Chancellor, in terms which are now often used in such cases, inviting observation as to the fitness of the gentlemen proposed. The Council raised objections to certain of those gentlemen; but the Lord Chancellor, after considering the objections, made the appointments. It is not intended to make any further addition to this Bench at the present time. The Secretary of State does not conceive it to be a part of his duty to interfere with the discretion which the Lord Chancellor thinks right to exercise in the selection of persons to be Justices of the Peace.

LAND ACT (IRELAND)—FAIR RENTS—CASE OF T. R. WHITNEY.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that Jeremiah Connolly, of the townland of Derrylugga, Barony of East Division of West Carberry, County Cork, a tenant of Thomas R. Whitney, Blackrock, County Cork, served an originating notice to have a fair rent fixed on the 11th November, 1881; whether his rent was £17, and valuation £12 5s.; whether his case was not adjudicated on till June, 1883, when the old rent of £17 was confirmed without reduction by the Sub-Commission presided over by Messrs. M'Devitt and Walpole; whether Connolly appealed from this decision on 15th July, 1883, and whether said appeal is still unheard; whether, if the facts are as above stated, he will explain the delay that has occurred in the hearing of this poor man's appeal, whereby he is still condemned to pay what may be ultimately decided to be an unjust and exorbitant rent; and, whether he can hold out any hope that the Chief Commission will soon hold a sitting in Cork to hear appeals so long pending?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said, the facts of the case were substantially as stated in the Question. The delay, which was a serious matter, had arisen through inadvertence on the part of the Land Commission. The Commissioners reported that a sitting would be held in West Cork in October or November next, when the case would be tried.

DR. KENNY asked, whether, considering the fact that this man's case had been so long delayed, he would not get the benefit of any reduction which might be made in the rent from the time he served his notice?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he had rather anticipated this Question; and he was prepared to say that, considering the gross negligence which had been shown on the part of some of the officials of the Land Commission, the circumstances mentioned would be taken into consideration.

POST OFFICE — AUXILIARY LETTER CARRIERS—CASE OF HENRY GOODCHILD.

MR. ISAACS (Newington, Walworth) asked the Postmaster General, Whether an application has recently been made, by Henry Goodchild, for an appointment as auxiliary letter carrier in the Metropolitan District, to supplement his present income, which he has been in receipt of for the past two and a-half years, as verger in a Church of England, and that such application was refused; whether the said applicant was a police constable in the Metropolitan Police Force, and took a leading part in a movement for an increase of pay and a reduction in the hours of duty, which was conceded by the then Chief Commissioner of Police, in consequence of which Goodchild was dismissed; and, whether the refusal to appoint him an auxiliary letter carrier was owing to such dismissal from the Police Force?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES) (Cambridge University): Henry Goodchild did, in August last, apply for employment as an auxiliary letter carrier in London; but, as it was ascertained that he had been dismissed from the Metropolitan Police Force, it was not deemed expedient to comply with his request. Even in the absence of such objection I should, of course, exercise my discretion in making the selections for such employment from among the very numerous applicants.

SCOTLAND—THE TWEED ACTS.

SIR EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the Government intend to bring forward this Session the promised reform of the Tweed Acts; and, if not, whether they will take steps to satisfy the strongly-expressed wish of the people living in Berwick and the adjoining part of the Tweed District, to have an extension of the time for net fishing for salmon on that River beyond the date fixed for its closing by the present law?

SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) asked the Lord Advocate, whether, before introducing any Bill regulating the fisheries in the River Tweed, he would give an opportunity to the Tweed Commissioners to express their views?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): Her Majesty's Government adhere to their intention of dealing with the Salmon Fishery Laws in Scotland; but the state of Public Business renders it most unlikely that this can be accomplished during the present Session. It is not thought advisable to deal by separate Bill with any special matter relating to salmon fisheries. In reply to the supplementary Question, the Government would be glad to receive any representations from the Tweed Commissioners on the matter.

RAILWAYS — INSPECTORS' REPORTS UPON ACCIDENTS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether the Board of Trade will consider the advisability of instructing their Inspectors, in making their Reports upon accidents, in all cases to append to such Reports a reference or references to Reports, if any, of the Inspectors of the Board of Trade upon previous accidents of a similar character on the same lines of railway, where the Inspectors of the Board of Trade have drawn attention to similar defects of plant or working, and have had occasion to make similar recommendations to the same Railway Company?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): It has been the practice of the Inspecting Officers generally to refer to recommendations previously made by them upon other accidents where similar recommendations had been made. Attention will be paid to the suggestion contained in the Question of the hon. Member; but it would be difficult to make an absolute rule in the matter.

CHARITY COMMISSIONERS—THE JUDD FOUNDATION, TONBRIDGE.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the Charity Commissioners have received from the Local Board of Tonbridge a Memorial praying that a scheme may be prepared for the establishment of a Second Grade School at Tonbridge, in connection with the Judd Foundation; and, whether the Commissioners will accede to the prayer of that Memorial?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The Charity Commissioners have received the Memorial mentioned in the Question; they have, in consequence, had under their consideration the present application of this wealthy endowment, and propose shortly to communicate with the Skinners' Company, as the Governors of the School, with a view to the furtherance of the proposal made by the Memorialists.

DISTURNIPIKED ROADS—ANNUAL RECEIPTS AND CONTRIBUTIONS.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, in view of the fact that the annual receipts from disturnpiked roads to the Imperial Exchequer is £215,000, and the contribution to the local expenditure in regard to those roads is given in proportion to their mileage alone, and not in reference to the previous increment from the tolls, nor to the present cost of the wear and tear, the Exchequer contribute a sum of only £1,000 annually in aid of the previously disturnpiked roads within the Metropolitan area; and, if such be the case, whether the road made through the Park by the First Commissioner of Works at Hyde Park Corner might be maintained out of the receipts received from the previously referred to disturnpiked roads generally?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): There are no receipts to the Imperial Exchequer from disturnpiked roads, and "the contribution to the local expenditure in regard to those roads" is not given "in proportion to their mileage alone;" but is based, in the case of the Metropolis, on the estimated annual cost of maintaining the roads as turnpike roads. The amount contributed by the Exchequer last year in respect of disturnpiked roads in the Metropolis was £1,759. As to the new streets at Hyde Park Corner, the expense of maintaining them has now for four years been borne by the Exchequer without local contribution of any kind; and it is to put a stop to this state of affairs that I have asked Parliament to pass the Hyde Park Corner (New Streets) Bill.

Sir Julian Goldsmid

MR. COX (Clare, E.) asked, whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman's attention had been directed to the great necessity of a crossing between Westminster Abbey and the House?

MR. PLUNKET: I am afraid that question does not spring very directly from the last one.

MR. COX gave Notice that he would put down a Question on the subject.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—BRADFORD SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he is aware that, in the borough of Bradford, the actual rate paid for School Board purposes much exceeds the rate nominally levied; and, if so, whether he would submit a Statement to the House of the amount of School Board rate in the £1 nominally levied, and that actually collected from the ratepayers?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford): The actual rate paid for School Board purposes may, in many cases, exceed the amount in the £1 nominally levied, as the Return submitted to Parliament is based upon the gross rateable value from which considerable deductions have to be made in the process of rating. I believe this to be the true explanation of the discrepancy; but I have no means of furnishing the information asked for in the latter part of the Question.

SOUTH AFRICA—ANNEXATIONS IN ZULULAND.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will state whether the Zulu people have given their sanction to the annexation of their territory to the British Empire; and, whether information has reached him that the Cape Colonists are very much averse to the extension of the British Possessions in South Africa?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead): The first Question has been, I think, sufficiently answered by my replies to the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) to-day, and to the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Richard Temple) on the 17th. With regard to the second Question, my reply is that, so far as Zululand is concerned, the Cape Government and people have for a long time desired that, in the interests of peace and public safety in South Africa, Zululand should be brought under the Queen's Sovereignty; and Her Majesty's Government have no reason to believe that there is any body of opinion in South Africa averse to the recent extension of the British Possessions. I may call the attention of the hon. Member to a speech made on Tuesday by Mr. Robinson, the Natal Delegate to the Colonial Conference, and a man of high intelligence and political experience. He expressed his belief that the Proclamation of the annexation of Zululand will be hailed with great satisfaction both by the European and Native populations of South Africa.

MR. W. REDMOND said, he wanted to know, were any steps taken to ascertain what the views of the people of Zululand were with regard to the annexation?

SIR HENRY HOLLAND replied that some time ago, in answer to a Question, he stated that he had been informed that the Zulus themselves had asked us to come in and protect them from the Boers. He also said he had telegraphed for information when it was decided to take further steps, and that Mr. Osborne and Sir Arthur Havelock informed the Colonial Office that the majority, inclusive of the people and the Chiefs, would gladly accede; that the people would be specially glad of British rule; and that that was the opinion of the Chiefs and those skilled in the government and knowledge of the people.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): What is the date of that telegram?

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: That telegram I have already read? It is dated the 13th, and was received on the 14th February last.

EGYPT — SIR HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF'S MISSION—REPORTED EVACUATION.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, as stated in The Standard of the 17th instant, that England and Turkey have agreed to the evacuation of Egypt in three years, on certain conditions; and, if so, what are these conditions, and when will the Government inform Parliament as to the instructions given by the Cabinet to Sir Henry Drummond Wolff?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JAMES FERGOUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I am unable to give the hon. Member any information on the subject.

MR. W. REDMOND: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to conceal all information from Parliament?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

RIVERS POLLUTION ACT—THE RIVER WEAR.

MR. W. CRAWFORD (Durham, Mid) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that in the rural parish of Crossgate, in Durham, a rate of 2s. 6d. in the £1 was levied by the Durham Rural Sanitary Authority to construct a sewer discharging unfiltered sewage into the River Wear; that the Auditor, having decided the construction of such sewer to be illegal and in contravention of the Rivers Pollution Act, thereupon disallowed and surcharged the members of the Board the amounts paid in respect thereof; that the Local Government Board, when appealed to by the Durham Rural Board, confirmed the Auditor's decision, but remitted the surcharge, thus depriving the ratepayers of any redress, although they admitted the rate of 2s. 6d. in the £1 wrongfully and illegally levied for such a purpose; and, if the circumstances are as stated, will the Government say whether the ratepayers of Crossgate have any means of recovering the rate of 2s. 6d. thus illegally levied on them?

THE PRESIDENT (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Sums amounting to about £130, which had been expended by the Durham Rural Sanitary Authority in providing a sewer for the contributory place of Crossgate, were disallowed by the Auditor on the ground that unpurified sewage was discharged through the sewer into the River Wear in contravention of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act. On an appeal by the members of the Sanitary Authority who were surcharged, the Local Government Board confirmed the Auditor's decision. It appeared, however, that the river was largely polluted from other sources, and that, in fact, the new sewer had not occasioned any material increase in the pollution. It did not seem to the Board necessary to require that the members surcharged should personally bear the cost of the works, and they, therefore, remitted the disallowance and surcharge. I am not aware of any means by which the rate-payers of Crossgate can be recouped the amount in question.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY—MR. E. M. LANGWORTHY — PRIVATE EXAMINATION.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that on Saturday last an examination in Bankruptcy in proceedings against Mr. E. M. Langworthy was conducted in private, and the Press prevented from reporting what took place; if he will state under what provision of the Bankruptcy Acts the proceedings were kept secret; and, whether he will consider the advisability, if necessary, of amending the Law so as to secure publicity in cases where, as in the one referred to, the question at issue is an alleged fictitious transfer of property by a debtor with a view to defraud his creditors?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORME) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): An examination of certain persons is taking place in the bankruptcy proceedings against Mr. E. M. Langworthy at the instance of the Chief Official Receiver. The proceedings are carried on under Section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act for the purposes of discovery, and the mode in which they are conducted is a matter within the province of the Bankruptcy Court itself. Such an examination is, however, as a matter of fact, conducted in private, in accordance with the practice of the Court, and the ends of justice might be entirely defeated if that were otherwise. But the ulterior proceedings to which the result of the examination may give rise will have the usual publicity.

Mr. Ritchie

FREE CHURCH OF (SCOTLAND—MISSION STATION AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention had been called to the Memorial from a Committee of the Free Church of Scotland with regard to certain property belonging to their Mission Station at Constantinople, dated 4th May, 1887; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will, in view of the statement of facts therein set forth, and considering that no pecuniary liability will be cast upon the Treasury, reconsider the instructions recently issued to Her Majesty's Ambassador at the Porte, and allow the property in question to be vested in the Embassy on trust for the Mission, in accordance with precedent and the prayer of the Memorialists?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): The Memorial in question has been communicated to the Treasury, who have decided that, under the circumstances set forth in it, the property may be held in trust by the Embassy, on the condition that it shall entail no pecuniary liability on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

EMIGRATION FROM IRELAND.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the alarming increase in the number of emigrants from Ireland during the month of April of the present year; and, whether he can give the House any idea as to the cause of the increase?

THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY (Colonel KING-HARMAN) (Kent, Isle of Thanet) (who replied) said: My attention has been directed to the considerable increase of emigration referred to in the Question. The hon. Gentleman might have gathered from the numbers which I stated a few days ago that my attention has been directed to the subject. In addition to the usual causes operating towards emigration, at present there is a considerable want of employment in the country, and there is a fear on the part of many as to the consequences likely to ensue from their past misconduct. There is likewise a disinclination on the part of many others to join Secret Societies, which, if they remained in the country, they would most probably be compelled to join.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD asked, whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman did not think the increase was due, at least in part, to the introduction of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill into this House, and to the conviction on the part of the people of Ireland—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! that is a matter of opinion, and not the subject of the Question.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The right hon. and gallant Gentleman, in answering the Question, had used the words, "My attention has been directed." The Question on the Paper was, whether the attention of the Chief Secretary had been directed to the subject?

INLAND REVENUE—THE INCOME TAX —CHARGE ON THE WIVES OF CIVIL AND MILITARY OFFICERS IN INDIA: AND OTHERS ABROAD.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the following General Instruction to the Surveyor of Taxes has been altered or cancelled:—

"A wife receiving an allowance or remittances from her husband abroad is to be charged for the same as his agent, under the second proviso to s. 45 of Act 5 & 6 Viet., c. 35, when the remittances are derived from any kind of property out of the United Kingdom, whether real or personal, movable or immovable. But remittances derived from trade profits, salary, &c., are not chargeable;"

whether the portion of the pay of Civil or Military officers in India, remitted to their wives at home, comes under the word "salary," and is not exempt from Income Tax, Income Tax having been already paid in India; whether he is aware that wives of Indian officers have been charged Income Tax in England on home remittances from their husband's pay; and whether this is in accordance with the law?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square), in reply, said, that the Instruction referred to had not been altered or cancelled. In answer to the second Question, he had to say that remittances such as the hon. Member had described were not liable to Income Tax provided the husband had not been at any time resident in this country during the year of assessment. But the exemption was not granted in connection with the payment of Income Tax in India. He was not aware that the wives of Indian officers were charged Income Tax under the circumstances mentioned; but if the hon. Gentleman brought to his notice any case in which that had been done it would receive attention.

IMMIGRATION OF DESTITUTE FOREIGNERS.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the alleged immigration into this country of a large number of foreigners in a destitute condition; and, whether, if the statement is correct, the Government will endeavour to make such representations to Foreign Governments as will put a check upon so heavy an addition to the burdens of the rate-payers of this country?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): There has been a considerable increase of foreigners in the East End of London who have become chargeable to the public, and complaints are also made of the impoverishment of wages caused by the competition of foreign labour in certain industries. If it were determined to take any steps to check the immigration of persons not in a condition to maintain themselves the matter would be one of domestic legislation, rather than for representation to Foreign Governments.

MR. T. P. GILL (Louth, S.) inquired, whether foreigners who entered English workhouses were sent back to their own country in the same way as Irish people were?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON replied that it was notorious that they could not send foreigners abroad in the same way that destitute people were sent to their own parishes.

METROPOLITAN DISTRICT—DEATHS FROM STARVATION AND PRIVA-TION.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to a Return, recently presented to this House, of deaths from starvation and privation in the Metropolitan District, whereby it appears that in the case of George Hicks, on whom an inquest was held on 12th March, 1886, the verdict of the jury was to the effect that—

"Death was accelerated by exposure to cold in the wood shed of Paddington Workhouse;" and that in the case of Thomas Turner, on whom an inquest was held on the 8th December, 1886, the deceased—

"Had been deterred from asking further parochial relief by letters demanding repayment for a loan" from the Edmonton Union; and, whether any official inquiry has been made into these cases; and, if not, whether he will cause inquiry to be made?

THE PRESIDENT (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have seen the Return referred to. The attention of the Local Government Board was drawn to the case of Hicks at the time when it occurred, and they ascertained that a committee of the Paddington Guardians had inquired into the matter, and had come to the conclusion to make provision for warming the wood shed at the Workhouse. This report was adopted by the Guardians. I am inquiring whether the necessary alterations have been carried out. As regards the case of Turner, I am informed that when in June, 1886, he made application to the Edmonton Guardians for relief he applied for it on loan. He received relief in the months of June and July, but did not afterwards apply; and it was not until November that application was made to him to commence the repayment of the value of the relief granted him. Whether this application deterred him from asking for further relief I am not at present able to say; but I am making further inquiries on the subject.

WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT) — DEFECTIVE WEAPONS — THE TESTS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, as all the bayonets in the hands of the Regular Infantry have now been re-tested, he can state what was the test to which they were submitted, and when it was introduced, how many were so tested, and how many failed to pass the test?

Mr. J. G. Talbot

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The long triangular Martini-Henry bayonets and the sword bayonets in the United Kingdom have been re-tested. The former were sprung on all three faces round a curved block $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches high in the centre—struck twice on each flat, and gauged; also a large percentage were twisted from point to socket through a quarter of a circle; 40,180 in the hands of the troops, and 123,400 in store were thus tested; $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of those with the troops and 3 per cent of those in store broke; $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent with the troops and $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in store were under gauge; $21\frac{1}{2}$ per cent with the troops and 11 per cent in store were found to be soft; and 69 per cent of those with the troops and $84\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of those in store passed the re-testing. Of the sword bayonets, 12,800 in the hands of troops and 22,000 in store were re-tested by being sprung round a curved block $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches high, or over a bridge giving the same bend, struck on an oak block on back and edge and on each flat, troughed, and gauged; 90 per cent of those with troops and $89\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of those in store passed the test. Of the remainder, in each case 9 per cent were soft, and 1 per cent of those with the troops and $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of those in store broke. Of the weapons which were returned as "soft," 50 per cent of the sword bayonets passed, after being re-hardened and tempered; and of the triangular bayonets, 75 per cent of those from the troops and 86 per cent of those in store passed under similar circumstances. As a much larger proportion of the weapons in the hands of the troops failed to pass the test than of those in store, it is evident that the bayonets have seriously deteriorated since their issue to the troops. Troops at home are, of course, all armed with re-tested bayonets. Supplies have been sent to the Mediterranean, Egypt, and South Africa, and those in the hands of the troops at those stations have been recalled for the purpose of being re-tested. Those only that pass the re-test will be placed in store. As previously stated, the bayonets in possession of the Militia will be re-tested during the present year, and replaced as necessary. I will now, with the permission of the House, refer to two Questions as to imperfect arms which my hon. Friend has previously addressed to me. He inquired as to an alleged testing, with very bad results, of the swords of the Royal Horse Guards in October last; but the officer commanding the regiment reports that no such test took place. Then, as regards the shovels which broke in the hands of men of the East Kent Regiment at Dover, I have to say that they were of a pattern introduced in 1871 from America as reserve intrenching tools. It was soon found that they were too light for ordinary unskilled work, and in 1875 a heavier and stronger pattern was introduced for general service; but the store of the light pattern was retained to be used gradually up. The tool is really a shovel, and answers fairly well at Chatham in the hands of the Sappers; but it is not fit for use as a spade thrust into heavy soil. The central store of these shovels at Woolwich is exhausted. Those at out-stations will be recalled, and replaced by proper spades. Steps are in progress to thoroughly overhaul all intrenching tools, and to reject from store all as to the utility of which there can be any serious doubt. There remains the question of the sword bayonets of the City of London Artillery Volunteers. After repeated applications, since my hon. Friend's Question, I have only this afternoon received Colonel Hope's Report as to the tests to which they were subjected. I should, therefore, prefer to reply on this point to-morrow.

MR. HANBURY asked, whether the test to which the sword bayonets had been recently subjected was the same as that to which they were subjected when they were first issued?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No; it is a much more severe test. Of course, the original testing took place a long time ago.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.) inquired, whether the new test would be applied to the intrenchment shovels in the possession of the Infantry?

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he understood that the arms and tools of all troops would be overhauled.

SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES—PENSION TO A CUSTOM HOUSE OFFICER—FRAUDULENT DRAWING.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the annual pension of £40 of a Custom House official, named Leckey, who retired at the age of 67 in 1845, and died in 1852, was drawn by his wife for 23 years after his death, and for a further 12 years by his daughter, up to March of this year; whether he has reason to believe that similar cases are not uncommon; what precautions are taken to prevent imposition of this kind; and, who are the officials to whose neglect the waste of public money in this instance was due?

MR. CALEB WRIGHT (Lancashire, S.W., Leigh) also asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any step will be taken to inquire into the abuses recently exposed of persons receiving pensions for many years after the lawful recipient has died; and whether during the present Session the Government intend to ask the House to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the Pension List?

THE SECRETARY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): Perhaps the hon. Member for the Leigh Division of Lancashire will allow me to deal with the Question which he has addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the same time as the Question of the hon. Member for Preston. As the House is, no doubt, aware, the offender in this case was prosecuted by the Board of Customs, was convicted of felony, and sentenced to a term of imprisonment. I have made inquiries of the Offices that pay pensions, and I am informed that no similar case has been discovered in any of the Civil Departments, though in military pensions attempts at personation appear not to be uncommon. The Regulations for the payment of pensions require the production of a certificate, attested by a Justice of the Peace, notary public, or a member of certain specified classes of the community, of the continued existence of the person claiming to be entitled to the pension, and a false declaration, of course, exposes the offender to legal penalties. In addition to this, though not prescribed by the Regulations, it has been the practice in, I believe, all paying Departments, except the Customs, to check the age of all claimants at certain intervals, and to exercise extreme care whenever the lapse of time since the grant of the pension or the age of a pensioner gave cause for exercising caution. I am considering whether this practice, or some development of it, should not be embodied in the Regulations. In the meantime, a general and careful scrutiny of pensioners is in progress. The method appears to me to be one entirely for Departmental regulation, and in no way to call for inquiry by a Select Committee of this House.

MR. HANBURY: Is nobody responsible in this matter?

MR. JACKSON: Obviously the persons responsible are the officials in the Custom House.

MR. HANBURY: Will the hon. Gentleman endeavour to trace the persons who are responsible?

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that until a few years ago there was a person who appeared in the Pension List as receiving a pension for services rendered in the American War of Independence?

[No reply.]

THE FRENCH EXHIBITION OF 1889.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of any communications that have passed between Her Majesty's Government and the French Government on the subject of the French Exhibition?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) (Manchester, N.E.): I shall be happy to lay upon the Table a copy of those communications.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—HOURS OF UNLOADING.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the fact that the hours of 8 a.m. to 4 p.m., during which goods may be landed out of vessels arriving from beyond the seas in four months of the year without payment of charges for overtime for the officials attending, are not suitable for the present state of navigation, which has changed so greatly from sailing vessels to steamers, and to ask if the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury will exercise their option of appointing "other hours," by making the time 6 a.m. to 6 p.m.?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): My attention has been called to this subject by Memorial from certain Chambers of Shipping. I will consider the question in concert with the Customs authorities, and see whether any extension of the hours can be obtained without any serious increase of expense to the Customs Department.

IMMIGRATION OF FOREIGNERS.

MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON (Leith, &c.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether, in view of the Memorandum issued on the Immigration of Foreigners into the United Kingdom, he will consider the advisability of framing some such Regulations with regard to this immigration as are in force at New York?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The matter to which the hon. Member refers is one of great intricacy; but I can assure him it is engaging the attention of the Board of Trade.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND) — POWERS OF SHERIFF.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If a Sheriff and those policemen who accompany him are entitled, whilst on eviction duty, to force their way through the lands of any farmer who objects, and says he will treat them as trespassers; if they should refuse to leave, is the owner of the land empowered to use as much force as is necessary to remove them; and, if so, will the Government, in order to prevent collisions between the policemen and the people, direct that, for the future, the evicting force shall go to the house to be evicted, by the ordinary road; and, is it a fact that the Sheriff and police have often forced their way through the lands of farmers who have objected?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University), in reply, said, that the Sheriff was not under the control of the Law Officers of the Crown. No complaint of the police had hitherto been made on the subject; but if any case, in which it was alleged the police acted improperly, was brought under his notice, he would cause inquiries to be made into it.

CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN — THE ROYAL TITLES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If Her Majesty's Government will consider, in connection with the forthcoming Jubilee rejoicings, and in concert with Colonial Governments, the desirability of advising the Crown to recognise the progress made during the 50 years of Her Majesty's reign by Canada, Australasia, South Africa, and many of the Colonies founded by the British people, by such further extension of the Royal titles as may place other portions of the Empire on an equality in this respect with Great Britain, Ireland, and India?

MR. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale) also asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether any action had been taken in consequence of the agreement unanimously come to at the Colonial Conference that, subject to Her Majesty's pleasure, there should be an extension of the present title of Her Majesty, so as to include a distinct reference to the Colonies?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): My answer to this Question will also be an answer to a Question of which I have received private Notice from the hon. member for the Kirkdale Division of Liverpool. The Question of the hon. Member for Sheffield was brought under the consideration of the Colonial Delegates at the Conference; and after some discussion they expressed themselves in favour of an extension of title, which would include the Colonies by special and distinct reference. Upon receiving an intimation of the opinion of the Delegates, Her Majesty's Government instructed the Governors of the responsible Government Colonies to ascertain the views of their respective Ministers upon this question. To this inquiry full replies have not yet been received; and there seems some little difference of opinion on the subject. It will, however, receive careful consideration from Her Majesty's Government.

DOMINION OF CANADA—IMPORT DUTIES ON IRON.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON (Liverpool, West Derby) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any official information in regard to the proposals, as reported by cable, of the Dominion Government to increase the import duties on pig iron by 100 per cent, on bar iron by 150 per cent, and on puddled bars by 350 per cent; and, if these reports are correct, whether Her Majesty's Government will use their good offices with the Dominion Government to procure a modification of proposals, which, if carried into effect, would prove highly detrimental to the iron trade of this country?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Her Majesty's Government have not received any official information in regard to any such proposals as these mentioned by my noble Friend; but the Government would not be justified in making any official representation on the subject to the Government of the Dominion, even if such information had been received. Any representations should be addressed to the Dominion Government by parties who may be affected by the fiscal policy of Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What business the Government intended to take on Monday and Tuesday, and on Monday the 6th June?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill will be proceeded with on Monday. I will on Monday state what Business will be taken on June 6. On Tuesday there will be the usual Motion for Adjournment, and perhaps one or two small measures.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND)—PROCLAMATION OF THE DUNGANNON MEETING.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a Question of which I gave him Notice yesterday, but which I was not in my place to ask. The Question is this—Whether the Government have proclaimed the anti-coercion meeting at Dungannon; and, if so, on what grounds; and perhaps the Chief Secretary would take this opportunity of stating to the House, as he promised to do, what the policy of the Government in Ireland is to be in reference to anti-coercion meetings?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): With regard to the meeting at Dungannon, it has been proclaimed. The ground for the Proclamation is that, in the opinion of those responsible for the peace of the district, the meeting could not be held without endangering the public safety. The reasons for that opinion will not surprise hon. Gentlemen, and it is that party feeling runs very high in the district. It was found that even if the second meeting were prohibited, the chance of disturbance would have been very great, as those who had intended to hold the second meeting would have attended the first meeting, with the probable result of great disturbance and loss of life. Under the circumstances, I am of opinion that the local magistrates did their duty in proclaiming both meetings.

MR. DILLON: The Chief Secretary promised, the other day, that the whole of this subject would be taken into the serious consideration of the Government; and I would ask him a further Question on this matter—Whether, in the first place, it is not now the deliberate and avowed policy in the Province of Ulster to call rival meetings in every instance where an anti-coercion meeting is called; whether, Sir, that policy was not previously adopted and put down by force by Earl Spencer; and, whether the Irish Government will not follow the policy adopted by Earl Spencer under precisely similar circumstances?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government propose to take any measures they think desirable and necessary to preserve the public peace; but I am perfectly ready to give a pledge that I will do what I can to frustrate any intention on the part of any party, whatever that party may be, in Ireland, to stop the right of public meeting by calling bogus meetings at the same place and on the same day.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I am very thankful to hear this declaration by the Chief Secretary. Will he show us that he means it in this very case at Dungannon by permitting the first meeting?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is not asking a Question.

MR. STOREY: Excuse me, I am asking a Question.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is arguing the Question.

MR. STOREY: I will ask this Question. Will the right hon. Gentleman, in the case of Dungannon, or in the next similar case, allow the first meeting and prohibit the second, and put down the men who interfere with the first?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; in any case similar to Dungannon I should act exactly as I have acted in that case. Hon. Gentlemen must allow me to follow the example of Earl Spencer in reserving full discretion to the Government. I have stated the general lines of policy that we shall pursue; and I think hon. Gentlemen must allow me to act on my own judgment.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in the case of the very Dungannon meeting in 1884 Earl Spencer allowed the Nationalist meeting to be held, although a rival meeting was held and addressed by Colonel King-Harman, who expressed his regret that the Nationalist meeting was protected and allowed to be held by Earl Spencer? I wish to ask him whether the Orange meeting attended by Colonel King-Harman, and the Nationalist meeting addressed by myself and others, went off without any breach of the peace whatever?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. and learned Gentleman is anxious to know what happened in 1884, and will give me Notice of the Question, either I or the Under Secretary will answer it. With regard to the inference he draws from the statement he makes, I must inform him that each case must be considered on its own merits; and the fact that a certain policy was right in 1884 is no proof, or even a presumption, that it is right in 1887.

WAR OFFICE—ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT—REPORT OF THE COMMISSION.

In reply to Sir WALTER B. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.),

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) said, the Report of the Commission would, in all probability, be circulated on Monday next.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT — THE NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE (1882) — RULE 2. — AD- JOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

ANNEXATIONS IN ZULULAND.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

MR. LABOUCHERE, Member for Northampton, rose in his place and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, the recent Annexation of portions of the Zulu territory, without the consent or knowledge of this House.

The pleasure of the House not having been signified—

MR. SPEAKER called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen :—

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he was not surprised that so large a number of Members approved the course he had taken, because no man of independent mind could deny that this was a matter of urgent public importance, and because the news of this annexation had come upon the public unofficially through the newspapers, and with great suddenness and surprise. When he asked for a day to consider the subject, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) stated that the Zulu Question might be discussed on the Colonial Estimates. But as the Government already had Supply to take them to July, he did not know when that could be, and the right hon. Gentleman might as well have offered them the Ides of March; and even when they had the opportunity the subject could only be raised by moving the reduction of the salary of the Secretary for the Colonies. Besides which the Chairman of Committees would probably rule out of Order a full discussion of the Question. He was, therefore, justified in bringing forward the Question at once and in the manner he had done. It must be admitted that our policy in South Africa had for many years been a most costly one. The wars that took place before the Transvaal difficulty arose had cost this country from £25,000,000 to £30,000,000 sterling, on which we had still to pay a large sum annually for interest. Since then the Transvaal and Zulu Wars and annexation had entailed a public expenditure of some £12,000,000 more. With reference to our relations with South Africa, and with Zululand in particular, from 1877 to the present year, he might remark that by the Zulu War and the measures by which it was immediately succeeded, we reduced a once flourishing nation to a state of almost absolute anarchy, and brought the people to a condition of starvation. Zebebu was a rival chief of Cetewayo. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London (Sir Robert Fowler) laughs.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London): That is not the way to pronounce the name.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he did not pretend to pronounce these names correctly. He was not an Alderman of the City of London. His name was spelt Z-e-b-e-b-u, and he called that Zeb-eeboo. Cetewayo was destroyed by Zebebu, who became master of Zululand. They were told by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) that Zululand had been practically annexed since 1879. But, if so, why was it that we had simply acted as arbitrators between the Zulus and the Boers in settling the frontier line of the new Republic? That did not look like an act of sovereignty. The real condition of things at the commencement of the present year was that one-third of Zululand belonged to us, about one-half of it was independent, and the rest of it had become the new Boer Republic. All that could be gathered of what had transpired since then was only to be found in the vague statements of newspaper correspondents, and in an answer of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies, given on Tuesday last, in which he gave an account of how this annexation took place. The right hon. Gentleman said that on the 8th of February the chiefs were informed by Mr. Osborn that British protection, carrying with it the supreme authority of Her Majesty's Government, was to be extended to Eastern Zululand. Four days later, that was on the 12th of February, he telegraphed for information as to the feeling of the Zulus on the subject, and received an answer on the 14th, giving it as Mr. Osborn's opinion that the majority of the chiefs would gladly accede. On the 15th the right hon. Gentleman said he received a telegram to the same effect from Sir Arthur Havelock. Now, this only began on the 8th of February, and by the 16th Her Majesty's Government had decided to carry out this annexation. He did not know whether it was sprung upon the Zulus; but it seems to have been sprung upon Her Majesty's Government by Mr. Osborn, and still more had it been sprung upon the House by Her Majesty's Government. Speaking last night at a banquet given to Mr. John Robinson, Lord Onslow had said that the annexation was necessary to secure peace and quiet on the Northern Frontier of Natal, to prevent internecine war, by regulating the relations of the Boers with the Zulus, and to preserve the existence of the latter people. That was but the ordinary trash put forward by every Government that effected an annexation. The Conservatives in this respect were worse than the Liberals, but the Liberals were bad enough. But the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for State perceived that a little more than that would be required by the House to explain this extraordinary annexation of territory. He therefore told the House, in answer to a Question, that the Zulus came under the permanent authority of Her Majesty's Government at the end of the war of 1879. He could not understand what was meant by the word "permanent." It was true that we occupied the country with troops, but afterwards withdrew and put up independent kinglets. It would be remembered that in 1880 the Natal Government was very anxious for the annexation, and there was a minute of Lord Wolseley's protesting against it. There was another point. Was this new Republic part of the British Empire? The Government did not in any way interfere when the Boers sought to establish their new Republic. Instead of stepping in and saying—"How has this been done?" they stepped in as arbitrators, and assisted in settling the frontier. The fact had to be faced that suddenly a huge territory as large as Ireland—[An hon. MEMBER: Not so large.]—well, say half as large—had been annexed, while Parliament had had no information, and there had been no discussion. They had had a very great experience of annexation in South Africa and elsewhere on the part of the Conservatives. They wanted to draw a trail over their conduct in Great Britain by some swagger abroad, so that they might say—"Look what a Government we are—we have increased the area of the British Empire." As he had said, there was no information on the subject forthcoming, and there had been no discussion, and they were told that perhaps there would be an opportunity of discussing it on the Colonial Estimates whenever they might come on. It was said in support of the annexation that it would prove a very remunerative speculation. The same thing was said of the annexation of Burmah. It was not known what Burmah had cost at present; but it must be a very wealthy country if it could afford an equivalent to that Bill. In all probability the Zulus hated us, and they would be very silly if they did not; for we had been a persistent curse to the country. The probability was that just as the Zulus objected to the Boers taking their country, so they objected to us doing the same, and anyone who went into their country to make war upon them or annex them was their enemy, and justly so. In fact, they wanted to be independent both of Boers and Englishmen. If Zululand were taken, Tongaland must also be taken. That was a very rich country, and he already saw a greedy look in the right hon. Gentleman's eye. But if we annexed the territory, what should we do with Amatongaland? and when we had swallowed up Zululand and Amatongaland, what should we do with Swaziland? He was perfectly certain that if we got meddling with Swaziland we should get into difficulties. In Africa they were reverting to the grand scheme of Lord Salisbury; they wanted annexation to this country, and they wanted unity, as it was called. He was not surprised that the English merchants connected with Southern Africa should be in favour of this annexation; they were always wanting this country to do something which would end in war, in order that a portion of the money should go into their pockets. They made their livings out of our small wars, and the very fact of their being in favour of the annexation was the best reason why they should be against it. He was opposed to all these Tory annexations. The Government professed to have shaken off their Jingo policy. He believed they were Jingoed still, and would remain Jingoed to the end of the chapter. He had moved the adjournment as a protest against this annexation. He believed a large number of hon. Members were of opinion that our policy in South Africa had been not only a most expensive one, but a most injurious one to the honour of the country. We were, without exception, the greatest robbers and marauders in regard to these annexations that had ever existed upon the face of the globe. If Russia took some little territory for the benefit of their frontier we said it was scandalous on the part of Russia. We were worse than other countries, because we were hypocrites also, for we plundered and always pretended that we did so for other people's good. Slave-owners said they took slaves from Africa for their benefit; but whether this annexation proved beneficial to the Zulus or not, he was certain it would be by no means beneficial to the British taxpayers, and, therefore, he thought they ought to protest from the very first against the Government recommencing that career of crime and annexation which distinguished them in 1878. He knew that in protesting against this annexation they would be told that they were obstructionists—[Cries of "Hear, hear!"] He thought so. Hon. Members opposite had such confidence in Her Majesty's Government as to allow them to do whatever they pleased without let, hindrance, or explanation. He perfectly understood their desire to coerce Ireland, but Ireland was not the only part of the British Empire. Hon. Members on the Opposition side, on the other hand, thought that on the present occasion they ought to take advantage of the Rule which allowed them to move the adjournment of the House, in order that the Minister might give some clear and definite explanation of what had been done.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (SIR HENRY HOLLAND) (Hampstead) said, he would in the first place enter a protest, which the hon. Member evidently expected would be entered, and which he (Sir Henry Holland) thought might most justly be entered against the course which the hon. Member had taken. He protested against this Motion for adjournment being made during the discussion of the Irish Criminal Procedure Bill, and solely for the purpose of delaying the discussion on that Bill. Entertaining that view, he should endeavour, as shortly as possible, to answer the argument put forward by the hon. Member. In the first place, he must remark that when the hon. Gentleman said this matter had been sprung upon the House, he must have carefully refrained from reading the Blue Book which was presented not long ago, and in which the question of the protection of Zululand and of its annexation was raised over and over again. To understand this question properly it was necessary to go back to the end of the war of 1879. At that time, Zululand came under the paramount authority of Her Majesty. She might, without doubt, have exercised that authority, and annexed the whole territory. That authority, although not fully exercised by us, had always existed, and had been fully recognized over and over again by the Zulus. It was recognized when we parcelled out Zululand among the Chiefs, and again when Cetewayo was restored. The conditions which specified that paramount authority were read out publicly when Cetewayo was restored to his monarchy. Cetewayo, ill-advised and ill-counselled, broke his pledges to Her Majesty's Government, fought Usibebu, was defeated and died. His son Dinizulu and the Usutu Chiefs then, in 1884, called in the Boers to assist them against Usibebu, and by the agreement of August, 1884, the Zulus practically ceded 4,234 square miles of country to the Boers, being a larger portion of land than is now recognized as the New Republic. Afterwards, the Chiefs became alarmed at the rapid encroachment of the Boers, which threatened their entire absorption, and they appealed to Her Majesty as the paramount authority to defend them. He would not take up the time of the House by reading the passages, but would refer them to pages 74 and 92 of [C. 4,645.] There were interviews with Sir Arthur Havelock in March and May, 1886, when in answer to appeals to save them from utter ruin the Chiefs were told that it was not possible to withhold recognition of the New Republic, but that Her Majesty's Government, although it was impossible to save all, or nearly all, for them, would endeavour to save as much they could. They then expressed their thanks, and said that, if the Government would take charge of them they would be taken care of, and freed from their troubles. The New Republic was recognized by Lord Granville in March, 1886, and Sir Arthur Havelock was then authorized to negotiate for a demarcation of boundary between the Republic and Eastern Zululand. He (Sir Henry Holland) found no fault with that policy of the late Government. On the contrary, he was inclined to think that it was the best policy in the interest of the Zulus. After some troublesome negotiations and troubles an agreement was signed on 22nd October, 1886, by which Commissioners were to be appointed to settle the Boundary. The Commission was composed of English, Boer, and Zulu Commissioners; but the latter did not attend. His presence might have been useful, but it was clearly not indispensable, as the Zulus had placed themselves in our hands. The demarcation was completed on the 25th of January, 1887, and although there was no doubt that some of the Zulu Chiefs had protested against the boundary agreed upon with the Boers, the ground of their protest was cut away from their feet by the fact that they had themselves invited in the Boers, and given them a much larger piece of territory than they had under this agreement and demarcation; and, also, because they had placed themselves unreservedly in the hands of Her Majesty's Government, and agreed to abide by what we did for them. Nor was there, in truth, any ground for complaint or protest. British Zululand will contain about 8,220 square miles—the Reserve Territory containing about 2,567 square miles, and Eastern Zululand 5,653 square miles—and this is irrespective of the St. Lucia Lake district, about 680 square miles. The area of the New Republic is 2,854 square miles, not much more than one-fourth of the total area. Again, by the agreement of August, 1884, the Zulus had practically ceded to the Boers some 4,234 square miles, and, therefore, the difference of 1,380 square miles had been secured to the Zulus by the intervention of Her Majesty's Government. On the 8th February, 1887, Mr. Osborn informed the Zulus that protection, carrying with it the supreme authority of Her Majesty's Government, was to be extended to Eastern Zululand, "and Chiefs and people therein." The question of protecting or annexing Zululand had for some time occupied the attention of Her Majesty's Government; and as far back as September, 1886, Mr. Stanhope had informed Sir Arthur Havelock that the question of a general protectorate over Zululand was reserved for consideration, and called upon him for his views on the proposal contained in his recent despatches for annexing that country to Natal. He (Sir Henry Holland) telegraphed to Sir Arthur Havelock on the 12th February to learn what was the then attitude of the Zulus, and whether there was any more general favourable feeling towards British protection. On the 14th he received a telegram in reply stating as follows:—

"Views as to general favourable feelings of Zulus strengthened by subsequent information received. Cardew recently returned from Zululand expresses opinion that people are prepared to accept British Government. Osborn says only obstacle is opposition of Ndabuko, other Chiefs do not offer any opposition to; thinks that majority, inclusive of Umnyamana, will gladly accede. People will be specially glad of British rule."

And again on the 14th February he received another telegram containing the following words:—

"Announcement received favourably by Umnyamana, who promised to send information to all headmen thereof. Dinuzulu and Undabuko did not reply."

Then on the 15th he received another telegram, which showed that Dinuzulu, Undabuko, and other Chiefs had given a favourable answer. In these circumstances he approved of Mr. Osborn's action, but that approval was not given until it appeared from those best qualified to offer an opinion, that the Chiefs and people assented to British rule. The only point that then remained for the decision of the Government was whether we should exercise sovereignty and annex Zululand or only establish a protectorate. Both Sir Arthur Havelock and Mr. Osborn strongly advocated annexation, and there were strong and weighty reasons for annexation as against a protectorate. Under a protectorate Her Majesty had no power of legislation, and the Government had been advised that she could not, under the Foreign Jurisdiction Acts, 1843 to 1878—which define Her authority in foreign countries—obtain legal jurisdiction over foreigners without the consent of their Governments, although she might establish Courts for her own subjects, and, if so conceded by the authorities of the country, over persons actually subject to Her protection. Again, in a protectorate Her Majesty could not issue titles to land, a matter of importance in Zululand, where individual ownership is practically unknown. These difficulties were all felt in Bechuanaland. There we began with a protectorate, and it broke down as soon as ever Europeans of different nationalities came into the country, and like difficulties had been experienced in governing the Reserve as a protectorate. He believed the Government acted wisely in abandoning a protectorate in favour of annexation. The situation, from a financial point of view, was satisfactory. He had already shown, in an answer to the hon. Member for Caithness, that the management of the Reserve under Sir Arthur Havelock had been most successful; £1,500 out of £6,000 advanced out of the Imperial Treasury had been repaid, and Sir Arthur Havelock had a cash balance of £6,736. The Revenue of the Reserve for the current year was estimated at about £11,980, and the expenditure at £9,748, so that there would be a balance of about £2,200, in addition to the Reserve balance of £6,736. The increase in the cost of the administration of Zululand was calculated at about £6,000 a-year, and about £5,000 would be due this year. Looking to the disturbed state of the country, the struggles through which the Zulus had been going, and their impoverished condition, it had not been thought wise to levy a Native Hut Tax this year. It was proposed to take £5,000 from the balance of the Reserve and apply it to the purposes of the Government. It was calculated that in future years Hut Taxes, licenses, and imposts, such as were levied in the Reserve, would cover the expenses of administration. He felt that he had not done justice to the case, because he thought the question ought not to have been brought on now, and he had, therefore, contented himself with simply stating the view of the Government and the grounds for their decision. Her Majesty's Government had been throughout actuated by a desire to do the best for the Zulus, and to maintain not only their liberty, but as large a part as possible of their territory. The task had been full of difficulty, and he could not close his remarks without bearing testimony to the zeal, ability, and judgment displayed by Sir Arthur Havelock and Mr. Osborn in dealing with these difficult questions.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, he entirely agreed with the action of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) in bringing this matter forward, and in his statement of facts, but he did not agree with the conclusion at which he had arrived. If we had to begin all over again it would be better to have nothing to do with Zululand. We committed a blunder and a crime in taking Zululand. But we had done these unfortunate persons so much injury that we were bound to do something for them. The hon. Member for Northampton had greatly exaggerated the geographical aspect of the question. The whole of Zululand was only about one-quarter of the area of Ireland. Whatever happened, he earnestly hoped that the country would not be treated like Basutoland, and handed over to Natal. The Zulus had a great deal to complain of in our having allowed the Boers to take part of their territory. The Boers were called in by discontented Zulus because they wanted to get possession of lands which did not belong to them. Having done them this wrong, it was the more incumbent on us not to hand the Zulus over to the tender mercies of the oligarchy in Natal. He would approve of the action of the Government if it would lead to a bona fide protectorate of the natives; but what he feared and apprehended was that the country would at a later period be handed over to Natal, which would be a most objectionable step, and it appeared to him to be contemplated as possible by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies. He again said, that if the Government would give them some pledge that they meant to administer this territory, and not leave it to a few Europeans in South Africa, then he thought the right thing had been done. If not, he believed an injustice would be done.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.) said, that his hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) had not adopted a very convenient mode of bringing that important question before the House; but, seeing how few opportunities the Session presented for doing so, he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) could hardly blame him for the course he had taken. As he had been Under Secretary of State for the Colony while the negotiations which culminated in this settlement were going on, he should be glad to be allowed to say a few words on the subject. It was but fair to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Sir Henry Holland) to say that he had to make the best of a bad business. They must bear in mind that the Zulus, though a very brave people by nature, and once possessed of a splendid military organization, had like most semi-savage nations, utterly collapsed when conquered. They had lost not only their spirit of independence and self-reliance, but their very sense of nationality. He referred shortly to the events which had followed on the Zulu War, to which all the evils of the country were to be traced, and especially to the agreement of August, 1884, under which the Zulu Chiefs had practically ceded to the Boers nearly the whole of their territory. The existence of that agreement made it impossible for Lord Granville—whose views would be found expressed in the despatch of March 11, 1885—altogether to ignore the claims of the Boers. The present Secretary of State for the Colonies had, in fact, taken up the negotiations for a settlement of the question where the late Government left them, and after listening attentively to the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) could not say that his statement was unsatisfactory. The settlement was, on the whole, more favourable to the Zulus than had been anticipated; nor could it be said that it had been sprung upon them. He was as much opposed to annexation as anyone; but, unfortunately, we had got ourselves so entangled in this matter that we must either throw the Zulus over entirely, in which case they would be “eaten up” by the Boers—who were a most voracious race—or we must take them in some way or other under our charge. Of the two, he preferred an annexation to a protectorate, which meant responsibility without control. The really important question was would this arrangement last? He was not afraid of the Zulus, who were utterly broken and dispirited; but he did fear the Boers, and he could only approve the settlement upon the understanding that every care would be taken to secure their loyal and scrupulous observance of the Treaty.

DR. CLARK and Mr. W. H. SMITH rose at the same time to address the House—

MR. SPEAKER called upon Mr. W. H. SMITH—

MR. W. H. SMITH: I claim, Sir, to move that the Question be now put. [Loud cries of assent and dissent.]

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The Question is that the Question be now put.

Question put accordingly, “That the Question be now put.”

The House divided:—Ayes 278; Noes 156: Majority 122.

Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 142; Noes 280: Majority 138.—(Div. List, No. 158.)

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to give Notice, Sir, that on as early an opportunity as possible I will call the attention of the House to your action and the action of the Leader of the House in proposing the closure on this occasion, and move a Resolution.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 217.]

(Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Secretary Matthews,
 Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 18th May.]

[TENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SUMMARY JURISDICTION.

Clause 2 (Extension of summary jurisdiction).

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I have to move as an Amendment after the word "shall," in the first line of the sub-section, the words "wilfully and knowingly." I am compelled to move this Amendment owing to the peculiar form in which the Government have worded their clause. They appear desirous of creating new crimes which have never before been heard of. We know very well what the crime of conspiracy is, and in the enactments dealing with that crime the offence has been specifically named. But for the purposes of this Act the Government describe the offence not as "conspiracy," but as taking part in any criminal conspiracy. The point I wish to make is—that no man can criminally conspire without being guilty of conspiracy, but that any man may innocently take part in a criminal conspiracy, and it is to protect a person in that position, who may be affected by the peculiar phraseology of the clause, that I move this Amendment. I do not know what attitude the Government may be disposed to assume towards it; but I presume they are not anxious to commit anybody under the clause unless he has been guilty of some offence. If a man participates in a criminal conspiracy, no doubt he ought to be punished; but there are a number of acts which a man may do innocently, but which would, nevertheless, make him liable under this clause. For instance, let me suppose that one of the overt acts of conspiracy was the holding of a meeting, and that the conveners of the meeting employed a bill-poster who was utterly innocent, who did not know what the meeting was called for, and who might even be unable to read the placard. As the Bill stands, the posting of the placard convening the meeting may be held to be an overt act of conspiracy, and the bill-poster would have rendered himself liable to punishment under the peculiar phraseology of this section, which punishes a man not for conspiring, but for taking part knowingly or not in a criminal conspiracy. I trust the Government will see that, as the clause is drawn at present, there is a distinct difficulty which ought to be removed in some way or other.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 17, after the word "shall," to insert the words "wilfully and knowingly."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): As far as I understand the words proposed by the hon. Member, they would neither add clearness to the wording of the Bill, nor improve its substance. In those circumstances, and according to the canon I laid down yesterday, it is impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I protest against this mode of dealing with an Amendment on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. He will not even condescend to give us his reasons for refusing the Amendment. We have seen some strange proceedings already this evening; but the right hon. Gentleman is presuming a little too far. I ask, and I ask respectfully, that we shall have some reasons given to us for any decision the Government come to. We cannot be expected to be content with the simple declaration of a Minister that he will not accept the Amendments we put forward. I protest against the attitude the right hon. Gentleman has assumed, and I ask him to observe the ordinary courtesy of giving the reasons of the Government for not accepting an Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I meant no discourtesy, and with due respect to the hon. Member, I did give a reason. I said the reason why we refuse the Amendment is that according as I read the words they neither make the Bill clearer nor in any way better.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Does the right hon. Gentleman think he has added to his former statement?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; I do not.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then, if he has added nothing to his former statement, he has been wasting the time of the Committee. There is such a thing as tedious and irrelevant repetition, Mr. Courtney, and when that is committed by a Minister it becomes specially offensive. I will tell the right hon. Gentleman this—that if the Government suppose they will shorten the discussion by giving such answers, they are greatly mistaken. A reply by the Government having been refused, I beg to move, Mr. Courtney, that you do report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 114; Noes 253: Majority 139.—(Div. List, No. 159.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I maintain that the Government ought to provide some safeguard for innocent persons, and not leave the matter to the Resident Magistrates. Language so vague as this section, as it now stands, has never been employed in an Act of Parliament. The terms of the Amendment, however, are the common phraseology of an Act of Parliament, so that the Irish Chief Secretary is altogether mistaken when he says that the Amendment will not improve the clause. It improves it in a most distinct manner. Take the case of a carman, who has driven persons to a meeting. The persons who are on the car may be attending the meeting for the purpose of taking part in a so-called criminal conspiracy, which the Lord Lieutenant has proclaimed. An election may be going on, or it may be a National League meeting that is about to be held; but the carman will have taken these men on his car quite innocently. Nevertheless, under this clause, he may be proceeded against for having taken part in a criminal conspiracy. Then, again, take the case of a man who has addressed envelopes. There may be to-morrow, in the City of London, men addressing envelopes by the thousand, but the contents of the letters enclosed in such envelopes may be altogether unknown to those who address them, and yet the mere fact of addressing them may involve a criminal conspiracy. In this case we throw the burden of proof on the individual. If this were an English Bill, it would be said that this is a very grave and important matter, and that a conspirator so-called should act with knowledge. The Bill does not say that any criminal conspirator should be punished, nor does it deal with a conspiracy; but it uses a much wider net, and says that "any person who takes part in a criminal conspiracy"—a vague term, never used hitherto in an Act of Parliament—shall be punishable under the clause. We are, therefore, driven to ask that it shall be "any person who knowingly takes part in a criminal conspiracy." We think the Government are bound to employ some saving phrase in the case of these men. The Chief Secretary refuses even to put in the words "criminally conspires," which would be a sufficient safeguard, because even the most far-reaching Resident Magistrate would not be able to say that the mere fact of driving a man upon a car was proof that the carman had criminally conspired. Let me give, as an illustration, what actually did take place in the County of Kerry a short time ago. A carman was unfortunately engaged to drive some men who were drunk, or rather, he gave them what is called a "lift." One of them fired off a revolver for mere swagger—a practice which the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) is, no doubt, very familiar with in the region he represents. The police not only arrested the unfortunate driver of the car, but kept him in gaol for four months, when a nolle prosequi was entered, and the case was laughed out of Court. There was no pretence for saying that the car driver had anything to do with the transaction; yet he was detained in prison for four months, without bail, the Court of Queen's Bench having refused bail simply because he happened to be driving a man on a car who committed an indiscreet act. I wish the Committee to bear in mind that this was done under the ordinary law, which is not nearly so harsh as the provisions of the present Bill. We have no desire that persons who are guilty should not be brought within the meshes of the law; but we remember the old proverb, "That it is better that ninety-nine guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should suffer." The very reverse of that proposition is provided in this subsection. It says virtually that ten men may be guilty of a criminal conspiracy, and 1,000 may take part in it innocently, but that all ought to suffer alike. I have pointed out that in this case the Court of Queen's Bench refused bail, and yet in the end the case was never brought to trial at all, but a nolle prosequi was taken. When you were discussing the English Law as it affects English Trades Unions, and persons who may conspire together in that way, you took very good care to provide that those who were to be punished should have taken part wilfully and knowingly in the conspiracy.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): The words which my hon. Friend (Mr. Maurice Healy) proposes to insert very frequently occur in Acts of Parliament which deal with crime. I think this clause undoubtedly requires it to be specified that before a person can be punished for taking part in a criminal conspiracy, he should wilfully and knowingly have participated in it. In offences proceeded against under the Excise Acts, it is always necessary to prove that the offender wilfully and knowingly broke the law, before any penalties can be recovered, and in that case proof is exceedingly difficult, because questions of law and fact are inextricably mixed up. The highest lawyers have held that persons may take part in a conspiracy, and yet be perfectly innocent of conspiring. How, then, is an Irish peasant to determine for himself whether any combination he may enter into is to be raised up to the standard of a conspiracy or not? Surely that would depend on his knowledge of the facts and the means to be employed, together with an accurate knowledge of the object to be attained. The means might be the means of rendering a combination criminal, or the object to be attained might import criminality into it. Under those circumstances, whether the Government accept the words proposed by the hon. Member, or the words which appear on the Paper lower down, "knowing the same to be criminal," I maintain that the clause should not be allowed to stand as it does. I cannot see that the acceptance of the Amendment, in drawing a distinction between what is criminal and what is not criminal, can in any way injure the efficiency of the Bill. Certainly some words of this kind are needed in order to protect an innocent person. Men may enter into a conspiracy to secure what they believe to be a laudable object; but means may be resorted to afterwards which may render the conspiracy criminal, but which were totally unknown to these men at the time they joined it. I think it ought to be made perfectly plain to the Resident Magistrate that the person brought before him knew that the conspiracy in which he had been engaged was criminal, and this Amendment would enable even a Resident Magistrate to discriminate between an innocent and a criminal conspiracy. I think the Committee will do well to press on the Government the necessity of importing some words into the clause—I do not say the exact words proposed here—so that persons who may enter into combinations quite as innocent as trade combinations, may not find themselves afterwards within the meshes of the law.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): In framing the Bill the Government have put in words where they ought not to be, and have left them out where they ought to be. If they will look at Sub-section 2, they will find the words are—

“Any person who shall wrongfully and without legal authority use violence or intimidation;”

and further on—

Now, if a person has a legal right to abstain from doing an act, no person has a legal right to compel him to do it. Therefore, the words of the Government in this case are altogether superfluous. What we require in the clause is protection for those who have no intention or desire to break the law. We know that any person who takes part in a riotous assembly, for instance, is responsible for the acts committed by any individual in that assembly; but, in that case, the person taking part must do so knowingly; because the Riot Act will have been read first as a warning. I do not know the legal meaning to be attached to these words; but, to my mind, it seems to be a plain, common-sense matter, to provide that no man shall be punished for anything he has not wilfully or knowingly done. For instance, the man may not have thoroughly understood the full extent of his act when he entered into the so-called conspiracy; he may have been merely performing a perfunctory part in connection with such conspiracy, such as writing letters, or driving a man to a meeting. I think the Government ought not to punish such persons. If they intend to do so, they ought at least to get up and tell us what their object is. From their present silence we can only conclude that they intend to make an indiscriminate use of the Act in regard to the innocent and the guilty alike.

MR. COLERIDGE (Sheffield, Attercliffe): I think we ought to have from the Government an indication of what they mean by the words “who shall take part in any criminal conspiracy.” Do the Government mean, or not, that it shall be the same as if it read “any person who shall conspire?” If so, those words are much higher, very much more simple, and very much more clear to the unlearned understanding. If the words do mean “any person who shall conspire to compel or induce any person or persons either not to fulfil his or their obligations,” &c., let them say so, and put the language as briefly and plainly as they can. But if they mean something more, and wish to bring within the meshes of this clause something above and beyond criminal conspiracy by introducing words which seem to be much wider than the mere inclusions of persons who are conspiring—namely, “persons who shall take part in any criminal conspiracy,” I think the Government should tell us why they use these words, and what their object is. If their object is to bring persons within the meshes of the Criminal Law, who are naturally not conspirators themselves, then I ask them to say what sort of persons they mean to get at. I am sure any lawyer would say that the addition of the words “wilfully or knowingly," to the word "conspire" would be surplusage; but if they were surplusage, they would do no harm. It must not be forgotten that the provisions of this measure are not to be interpreted by lawyers, but that the Act is to be administered by persons who are not lawyers primâ facie, and have not had experience in construing Acts of Parliament. I think the Government may reasonably say, whether or not they mean in this first sub-section "any person who shall conspire" or something further and beyond that, and if so, what is it they mean by the words "any person who shall take part in a criminal conspiracy."

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I do not think that these three words "wilfully and knowingly," are by any means surplusage, but they point out very clearly what the meaning of the provision is. Undoubtedly, there are in conspiracies acts which may be done without being punishable as criminal. A and B may conspire together to do a certain thing which, if done by A separately, or by B separately would be perfectly lawful, and which only becomes a conspiracy when it is done by two or more persons. The offence is in the agreement, and not in the act. The Government propose to take a number of acts which are in themselves innocent, and make them crimes. In point of fact, they are making a new crime of certain things which are perfectly innocent as the law now stands, and at least they ought to insert words in the clause to require that an Act which is now innocent shall, if it is to be made criminal, have been done "wilfully and knowingly." The magistrate should have power to say—"This is an act which in itself is a perfectly innocent act, and it is desirable that I should have evidence that the person who did it did it knowingly and wilfully in furtherance of a conspiracy. Unless that is proved, I do not see how I am to commit him." I know the Government do not intend that, but that they wish to catch any person who takes part in any conspiracy. Let me put a case which may be considered far-fetched, but which is perfectly possible. I remember a case in which a Resident Magistrate sent a boy of 12 to gaol for a month, because he whistled at a policeman in Limerick. Suppose a cabman drives Mr. William O'Brien from a railway station on the Great Western Railway in Ireland, is it to be held that that cabman has taken part in any conspiracy in which Mr. William O'Brien may have been engaged? [MR. T. M. HEALY: Or the engine driver.] Yes, or the engine driver. If you add these words "wilfully and knowingly" the person accused would be able to say—"I did not know that Mr. William O'Brien was going down to the place to which I drove him for the purpose of instituting the Plan of Campaign." As the clause now stands, all the Resident Magistrate would say is this—"What I want to know is, whether you took part in the matter. Your guilty knowledge is nothing to me, and therefore you must go to prison for six months." I defy any lawyer sitting on the Treasury Bench to point to any code of law, whether European, or Indian, or even Chinese, which establishes such an offence as taking part in a criminal conspiracy. The whole thing is a farrago of nonsense in order to enable the Resident Magistrate to do anything he likes.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I must express my astonishment at the reiterated answer on the part of the Government, that these words will not improve the clause. I do not think that they can be regarded as mere surplusage. If they are, how is it that you find them used so frequently in the English Acts? I may point out that in the Act of 1875, dealing with contracts of service between masters and workmen, the words are "wilfully and maliciously breaking a contract of service, or breaking a contract involving injury to person and property." In the fifth section of that Act, the words are any person who shall "wilfully and maliciously break a contract." Why should that be proper in an Act relating to England, and be pure surplusage and altogether useless in a Bill which is to apply to Ireland? Why should words be reasonable in one Act, and unreasonable in another? With regard to our present proceedings, we are engaged in making criminal now that which has not been criminal before. It is a well-established rule that in taking proceedings against a man for crime, the offence he is accused of should be exhaustively set forth in full detail, and there is nothing more common than to say that a thing has been done wilfully. Here you propose that a man is to be held guilty of criminal conduct when you admit, by implication at least, that you are not prepared to prove that his intent was criminal. Let me take this case, in order to enable tenants to get rid of their cattle before they could be seized by their landlords. Men have been employed in posting notices announcing the fact that a fair or auction for the sale of cattle would be held at a particular place, on a particular day. That sale is held for the express purpose of enabling the tenants to defeat the object of the landlord. Under this section, as it is at present worded, every innocent bill poster who posts the notice may be held to have taken part in a criminal conspiracy, and, not only so, but every newspaper which advertises the sale, or the book-stalls of W. H. Smith and Co., who sell the newspapers in which such advertisement appears—all of them, under this clause, may be held to have taken part in a criminal conspiracy. Under these circumstances, having regard to the great laxity of language in which the section is drafted, and the extremely harsh and cruel character of the section itself, I think it is not unreasonable to ask the Government, at any rate, so to modify the wording of the section that no one shall be liable to be sent to prison for six months' hard labour against whom it has not been clearly established that he was not only guilty of the act imputed to him, but that he did it with a guilty knowledge.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): A suggestion has been made by the hon. and learned Member for the Attercliffe Division of Sheffield (Mr. Coleridge) to substitute the words "shall conspire." I have an Amendment lower down on the Paper to leave out "take part in any criminal conspiracy," and to insert "conspire by violence or intimidation." I quite agree with my hon. and learned Friend that if the word used is "conspire," then the words "knowingly and wilfully" would be surplusage. I do not intend to say that they may not be surplusage as they stand; but, certainly, they would get rid of any ambiguity which might be entertained in regard to the meaning of the section in its present shape. I think it would be much more intelligible to say "shall conspire" instead of saying "any person who shall take part in a criminal conspiracy." Those are words which, as far as I am aware, do not occur in any other Act of Parliament. I think the Committee would be satisfied if the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant would say that he will omit the words "take part in a criminal conspiracy" in order to adopt the words "shall conspire."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): That is a matter which will come on later in a subsequent Amendment. I have already put down an Amendment myself to provide that the criminal conspiracy shall be one now punishable by law. I cannot regard the words which have been proposed as anything but surplusage, if attached to the words in the clause "take part in a criminal conspiracy," or to the word "conspire," which it is proposed to substitute. The hon. Member for East Donegal (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) has referred to an Act of Parliament passed in 1875, in which the words "wilfully and maliciously" occur, and he asks why they do not occur here. He seems to forget that that Act dealt with contracts, and the essence of the offence in that case is that the contract should be "wilfully and maliciously broken" or otherwise the breaking would be quite innocent. [MR. T. M. HEALY: That is exactly our case here.] By using the words "criminal conspiracy" you are referring to a thing which, in the very nature of it, must have been done "wilfully and knowingly," and, therefore, the addition of these words would be mere surplusage, and even worse than surplusage, because they might introduce an element of doubt.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I can congratulate the right hon. and learned Gentleman on being, at all events, able to argue the matter; because that was not the course taken by the Chief Secretary, and every Amendment proposed on any subject whatever may be met by saying it does not make the matter more clear or better. I wish to point out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that his argument exactly makes out our case, because he says the words "wilfully and maliciously" have been applied to the breaking of a contract. Surely a contract and an agreement are very much the same thing. Why is a man to be a conspirator in the case of breaking an agreement, and not to be a conspirator if he takes part in the breaking of a contract? Why in the one case should you insist that it must be done "wilfully and maliciously," and not in the other? Therefore, the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman triumphantly substantiates our case for the Amendment. We only ask the Government to follow the precedent stated in the Act of 1875, introduced by an eminent Conservative authority from his own point of view—Sir Richard Cross. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has accurately stated the purport of that Act. The words "wilfully and maliciously" occur both in the 4th and 5th clauses of the Act. The 4th section runs in this way—

"Any person who wilfully and maliciously breaks a contract of service, knowing the consequences of breaking it."

That is exactly our case. Am I to be told that a man can break a contract without knowing it? Section 5 says—"Where any person maliciously and wilfully breaks a contract." That Act was passed in 1875. I do not see any Gentlemen now present on the Treasury Bench who assisted in passing that Act; but there are Gentlemen on that Bench who took part in amending it, and who considered that it was for the interests of the British artisans to insert the words "wilfully and maliciously." Why, then, should we not follow that precedent, and take good Conservative words—some good Primrose language? I fail to see what objection can be taken to them, and especially by the Conservative Party, under the circumstances. I think it is a little too bad for the Conservative Irish Chief Secretary to say that the words of his own Statute do not make the matter more clear.

MR. A. COHEN (Southwark, W.): According to the highest authorities, conspiracy is nothing else than a criminal agreement. The Attorney General for England will assent to that. Then how can you speak of taking part in an agreement? Is not that an absurdity? You can be parties to an agreement; but it is absurd to talk of taking part in an agreement.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I wish to emphasize the fact that I have been compelled to draw up and move this Amendment by the use, on the part of the Government, of language of a novel and untechnical character. When you use language in a Bill which is not in accordance with the rules of grammar, you tell us it is technical language that is clearly understood. Now, I maintain that if the crime is murder, you should say murder; if it is arson, you should say arson—and not taking part in murder, or taking part in arson. In the 4th section, there are some half-a-dozen crimes described in proper and technical language—namely,

"Murder or manslaughter; attempt to murder; aggravated crime of violence against the person; arson by statute or common law; breaking into, firing at or into, or otherwise assaulting or injuring a dwelling-house."

I fail to see why, in this section, the Government should have departed from the use of ordinary and well-established legal language, and say that the words I propose to insert are surplusage. Now, I think it would have been surplusage if I had used the word "conspire," because every lawyer knows that to conspire implies "wilfully and knowingly." The Government have gone out of their way in using words of a novel character—namely, "any person who shall take part in a criminal conspiracy;" and I think we are compelled to step in and see that words so wide in their character are not to be wrested from the meaning it is intended by the Government they should bear. I consider that this is an important Amendment, and that it is not surplusage.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I must say that the silence of the Government is exceedingly ominous. The hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. A. Cohen) has pointed out the extraordinary character of these words, and, as the Government remain silent, we are naturally led to suppose that they have some purpose in retaining words so peculiar, and that they will not condescend to give any expression of their views to the Committee. The words are—"any person who shall take part in a criminal conspiracy;" and as the hon. and learned Member for Southwark has pointed out, those words are simply absurd, unless it is intended to use the clause in an operative way, and in some way which would not have been possible if ordinary language had been used. Let me give this illustration. The Parliamentary Party to which I belong consists of 86 Members. If one of us were brought up, and the charge were brought home to him of having taken part in a criminal conspiracy, every one of those 86 Members of the Irish Party would be liable to prosecution; and so those who have voted with us would be held to be parties to everything that has been going on in Ireland. There is another matter which occurs to my mind—namely, the fact that everybody connected with a newspaper who may advertise a sale of stock in Ireland under the Plan of Campaign, any person engaged in printing or selling that newspaper, or in working the press in the office, may be held to have taken part in a criminal conspiracy. All we want is that the Government should confine the clause to those who may be actually engaged in a conspiracy. Before we proceed to a Division, I hope I may be allowed to say that the Government are themselves to blame for the length to which this discussion has extended. The discussion of the Amendment has taken quite three times the length it would have taken if the Government had met us, in the first instance, with ordinary courtesy.

Original Question put.

MR. CHANCE: An Amendment in my name stands next on the Paper; but I do not feel inclined to stand in the way of the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell), and, therefore, I will not move it.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): In rising to move that the words "take part in any criminal conspiracy" be omitted, for the purpose of inserting the words "conspire by violence or intimidation," I trust the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland will be good enough to apply his mind to the reasons I am about to give in favour of the Amendment. I fully recognize the position in which the matter now stands—namely, that certain points have been determined by the Committee in the Votes which have already been taken on this part of the Bill. I am, of course, ready to recognize the fact that the Committee have settled that the inquiry into offences in Section 2 is to take place under Section 1; and also, that on the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) it was decided yesterday, that conspiracy is one of the offences and crimes in regard to which summary jurisdiction may be exercised by the Resident Magistrates. Fully bearing that in mind, I believe that my Amendment is quite in harmony with the decisions which have been arrived at. Considering who the magistrates will be by whom the Bill will have to be administered when it becomes law, it is necessary, for their guidance, to lay down clearly and distinctly, that the conspiracy with which they will have to deal is one of a defined criminal character. I think it is impossible—and I say so with all deference to my hon. and learned Friends on the other side of the Table—it is impossible to defend this clause as it now stands. The first observation I make upon it is, although the discussion has to some extent been anticipated—and I shall avoid as far as I can repeating it—these words—"take part in a criminal conspiracy," are not words, as far as I know, which can be found in any Statute. In dealing with a criminal question, I think we are entitled to know—and the reasonableness of the demand will be recognized—what the Government mean by these words, "take part in a criminal conspiracy," and why they have departed from the use of the usual language in such cases—namely, "shall conspire." In other words, we are entitled to know what is meant to be covered by the words, "take part in a criminal conspiracy," which would not be covered by the words "shall conspire," and if anything is left to be covered by the words "take part in a criminal conspiracy" which would not be covered by the words "shall conspire." Why have they adopted these unusual words? It is not at all an exaggeration to say that undoubtedly these words, "take part in a criminal conspiracy," may, in their construction, be stretched beyond what the Government honestly desire in the legitimate administration of the Act. Is it intended by the use of these unusual words to include not only the offences directly dealt with under this section, but something which does not amount to conspiracy? If the man who "takes part in a criminal conspiracy" is to be the conspirator who conspires, why not say that the section is to apply to persons who "shall conspire." Cases have already been pointed out, and they may be multiplied indefinitely, in which by the use of this language, persons may be said to have taken part in a conspiracy, although in no sense have they really been conspirators. Let me assume a combination among tenants to pay a reduced rent, and that the persons who are combining hold a meeting, and the proceedings at such meeting are reported in the columns of the newspapers. Is it to be said that reporting the meeting is "taking part in a criminal conspiracy," so as to make the newspaper proprietor an accomplice in a conspiracy under this clause. Is it to be said that anybody who takes part in anything which may lead up to a conspiracy is necessarily a conspirator? It is essential that there should be no ambiguity on this point, and we are entitled to have a clear explanation from the Government of the reason which has induced them to depart from the usual language of an Act of Parliament. To illustrate what I mean, let me refer the Committee to the 5th sub-section of this clause—

So that under that sub-section any person who might incite, solicit, encourage, or persuade, A and B to take part in a criminal conspiracy with C and D, to compel or induce the rest of the letters of the alphabet to do any of the offences mentioned in the Act would be a criminal offender. It is absolutely necessary, if there is to be any real safeguard for the working of the Act, that the words should be much more closely drawn, and the offences proposed to be dealt with more clearly defined than is the case in the clause as it now stands. I wish, however, to make my position clear upon another ground. The Home Secretary, speaking in the debate on the 12th of April, said—

"This Bill is not directed at combinations among tenants to pay only a reduced rent, provided they do not have recourse to violence or unlawful means."—(3 Hansard, [313] 784.); and later he interrupted the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), and said—

Sir Charles Russell

"Any combination of tenants in which they agree between themselves to pay a lower rent, without using any means of coercion on the landlord, would be a lawful, and not a criminal combination."—(Ibid, 798.)

If the Government really means that these combinations are only criminal when criminal means are used they ought to alter the first line of this sub-section, so as to put the matter beyond doubt. Having called attention to the language of the Home Secretary, let me refer also to a letter written by Lord Bramwell to one of the newspapers, in which he declares that it is not conspiracy for tenants to agree to act together; that there is no such crime as inciting to do a lawful, and not an illegal act. Yet this Bill is making it a crime to solicit anyone to do what is admitted not to be unlawful in itself. We have had long and learned discussions on the Law of Conspiracy, and I think the conclusion to be derived from those discussions is, that the Law of Conspiracy which exists in this country is of an exceedingly vague and indefinite character. It is hardly too much to say that at one time, according to the current of judicial opinion, anything might have been called a criminal conspiracy which any Judge chose to regard as morally, socially, or politically wrong. The safeguard was that it did not depend upon the Judge to determine whether or not there was guilt under a charge of conspiracy, because in the administration of the Law of Conspiracy the functions of the jury always came in as a protection and a defence against Judge-made law on the subject. But that is a protection and a defence which the Government, by their present scheme, are taking away, and they are leaving the Law of Conspiracy, admittedly vague, to be dealt with by a tribunal in which we have had ample proof, in the course of this discussion, no great amount of faith can be reposed, and which will be drawn mainly from a class adverse to the class against which the provisions of the Bill are to be directed, and a class of men who have no right to be considered lawyers equal to the task of discriminating nice questions of law. Therefore, we ought to make the law clear and plain, and that is the object of the Amendment I am about to propose. It is no answer to my Amendment for the Government to say that they do not propose in this Bill to codify the Law of Conspiracy. I do not ask them to codify the Law of Conspiracy; I leave the general Law of Conspiracy to be dealt with by the ordinary law and the ordinary tribunals. All I ask by the Amendment is to restrict the exercise of this summary jurisdiction which you are giving to this tribunal to cases of conspiracy which are clear, unmistakable, and criminal in their character. Therefore, I am not answered by the objection urged the other night by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, that I am asking the Government to codify the Law of Conspiracy. There is another matter in regard to the vagueness of this clause of the Bill—namely, the use of the word “criminal” as it is used in the context. I submit, with great confidence, that the word “criminal” as it stands in the section has no force whatever greater than the section would have if that word had been omitted. The section begins by saying—“Any person who shall commit any of the following offences,” and omitting the word “criminal,” it proceeds to say—“Any person who shall take part in any conspiracy,” and so on. If the word “criminal” were not used, the Legislature would show that it intends to treat as offences under this section the doing of the particular matters which are specified, and the matter is not substantially improved by the Amendment of the Attorney General—No. 25—by which he seeks to introduce the words “any criminal conspiracy now punishable by law.” What guide would that be to the uninformed tribunal which is to administer this section as to matters upon which there may be a serious difference of opinion? In my opinion, it is not possible to formulate any judgment on the Law of Conspiracy much closer than that which I have ventured to suggest, and the interpretation of the law will depend very much upon the mind of the Judges of the particular tribunals who will have to administer it. But I will point out to the Committee some further reasons why it seems to me to be important in the matter whether there ought to be this distinction. The whole tendency of the legislative efforts of successive Governments has been to get rid of the present vague and indefinite state of the law which goes under the general designation of the Common Law of Conspiracy; and my hon. and learned Friends will remember that upon the Commission on which some of the most distinguished Judges sat, including Mr. Justice Stephen, Lord Blackburn, Lord Justice Barry, and Mr. Justice Lush, the Commission sought to limit the Law of Conspiracy to certain definite subject-matter which they specified under various heads, and to remove entirely from the law that reference to the Common Law of Conspiracy which is now, under general words, introduced again in so insidious and dangerous a form. In their Report, the Commissioners go the length of saying—

“We have taken upon ourselves the responsibility of recommending that conspiracy (amongst other crimes) should no longer be indictable at Common Law, and the principal statutory conspiracies provided for were”—

I direct the attention of the Committee to this because it gives an exhaustive enumeration of criminal conspiracies—

“treasonable seditions to bring false accusations to defraud and to commit indictable offences.”

When Sir John Holker brought in his Bill it was framed on the lines of the recommendations of the Criminal Code Commission; but I do not find in the Code which he proposed any such provision as this—

“To compel or induce any person or persons either not to fulfil his or their legal obligations, or not to let, hire, use, or occupy any land, or not to deal with, work for, or hire any person or persons in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation, or to interfere with the administration of the law.”

There is no such category contained in Sir John Holker's Code under the head of “Conspiracy.” The Amendment I now propose to the Committee will, if adopted, make the clause read—“Any person who shall conspire by violence or intimidation to compel or induce any of the things specified in the clause to be done.” I wish to know what reasonable objection can be urged to that Amendment? What is the offence that is criminal in its character which is not covered by those words? What criminal conspiracy is not included in the words “any person who shall conspire by violence or intimidation” to do certain things. I had not the pleasure of hearing the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General the other day, but I have read it. It was delivered in connection with another clause, in regard to which I conceive that the discussion was a little premature. I believe that you, Mr. Courtney, gave an intimation to that effect, and, if I may say so, I quite agree with you. My hon. and learned Friend was pressed to say if the object of the clause was not covered by my words. What was his answer? He made this strained suggestion—that there might be a case of putting pressure upon a man to compel him to do or not to do a thing—such as a combination to injure and defame. Is my hon. and learned Friend able to say that that is a common offence? Certainly, we have no evidence of its existence in Ireland. I do not recollect a single case in my life in which a charge of conspiring to injure and defame has ever been tried. Therefore, if my hon. and learned Friend has nothing further to say than that, I think he has given no answer at all to my Amendment. I submit that if any such cases should arise, it would be only right and proper to leave them to be dealt with by the ordinary law, and not to be dealt with by a tribunal with summary jurisdiction. I again wish to impress on the Committee that I am not seeking to have anything declared to be no offence, which according to law is an offence; but I wish to have it shown in unmistakable language that what the Legislature means in giving this power to the Irish Resident Magistrates is to give them power to deal with conspiracies which are conspiracies by violence or intimidation to coerce persons to do or not to do certain things. These are the reasons which induce me to think that the Amendment is one which ought to be accepted by the Government, and all the more, because of the character of the tribunal to which this jurisdiction is remitted, and because the Government have professed to the House that they intend to put down real crime only. I say that the clause, as it stands, goes far beyond that; that the language in which it is couched is imperfect, indefinite, incomplete, and objectionable; that it gives power to the Resident Magistrates which they ought not to have, and it makes use of language which is easily capable of being misconstrued. I beg to move the Amendment of which I have given Notice.

Sir Charles Russell

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 17, leave out the words "take part in any criminal conspiracy," and insert the words "conspire by violence or intimidation."—(Sir Charles Russell.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): My hon. and learned Friend complains of the words "take part in any criminal conspiracy." I do not agree with him that this language is untechnical. The reason why that language is adopted is because the Government are of opinion, rightly or wrongly, that it correctly expresses what is the legal effect of the acts which constitute conspiracy. I pointed out the other night that it was not only the conspiracy or agreeing which was important in relation to this matter, but that it was the intent, purpose, and means by which it was proposed to carry out the agreement, and that some of these matters will have to be considered as questions of fact, and not as questions of law, when you are dealing with the question of criminal conspiracy. My hon. and learned Friend says that the word "criminal," inserted in the Bill, means nothing, and he says, also, that I mean nothing by the Amendment which I have proposed, the words of which are "any criminal conspiracy now punishable by law." [Sir CHARLES RUSSELL: I said it was too vague.] If my hon. Friend had waited, I think I should have, in another instant, have made my meaning clear. I will point out again to the Committee why these words were inserted. We have argued over and over again that there are combinations or conspiracies which are not unnecessarily unlawful or criminal; and we consider it desirable that on the face of the section, especially when we are transferring the jurisdiction to a new tribunal, we should indicate that we do mean conspiracies of a criminal character, and not combinations which, although they might be objectionable—such, for instance, as that to which I referred the other night—are still not criminal in their character. Therefore, we thought, and still think, that the word "criminal" is operative and effective. What I propose to do is this. It is suggested that you would be able to treat things as conspiracies which would not now be regarded as conspiracies, owing to altered circumstances. It was for the purpose of meeting that objection that the words are to be introduced "punishable by law." I am surprised that it should be imagined that the words in Sub-section 5 can be construed as inciting to do a lawful thing; the simple object of the words is to enable an accessory to be dealt with, and it was in no way with the object of making anything unlawful which was otherwise lawful that these words are introduced. There is a further argument of my hon. and learned Friend which I wish to deal with. He said you ought to lay down some strict definition of conspiracy, because you are going to transfer the jurisdiction from the jury to the magistrate, and because you are taking away the safeguard of the jury. I am aware that this is an important matter; but will the Committee for a moment consider what the real safeguard of the jury is? The only ground on which this could be suggested is that the Resident Magistrates would not be as good judges of facts as the jury are; but it is not that the jury are competent lawyers, but that they are considered to be good judges of facts, and of the intent or purpose with which an act is done. That, I think, might be left to the Resident Magistrate, because you say we are taking it out of the region of inference of law. I assume that the Resident Magistrates do their duty, and that they are not corrupt or partial, but honest men. Then, I say, that they are as good judges of fact, and even better, than the highest skilled and trained lawyers, although they do not know so much of the law. I submit that the very criticism against the removal from juries which the hon. and learned Gentleman has brought forward is an argument in favour of the transfer to the jurisdiction of the Resident Magistrates. My hon. and learned Friend says you will find nothing in the Criminal Code which contemplates such a distinction as this with regard to conspiracy. My hon. and learned Friend read out somewhat hurriedly an enumeration of the different kinds of conspiracy, but I think I caught the words "conspiracy to commit an indictable offence." I believe those words were there, and if so, I say that is not a narrow definition of the Law of Conspiracy;

it is a net spread as wide as it can be spread. My objection to the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend is not an argument drawn from any Act of Parliament; it is that it narrows the offence to a degree to which it ought not to be narrowed. I want to know why a conspiracy "by fraud" to compel people to do these acts should not be an indictable offence? If I put in "by fraud," it might immediately be said that we are endeavouring, for the purposes of this Bill, to codify what is criminal conspiracy; and I protest that it would be unwise to insert in this Bill the particular acts which are to constitute criminal conspiracy. There are a great variety of cases outside the words "violence or intimidation" which may have to be dealt with under this section; and to accept the Amendment would be to let go free many conspiracies which we are endeavouring to put an end to. For these reasons, it is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to accept the Amendment.

MR. J. B. BALFOUR (Clackmannan, &c.): It is, I think, impossible to exaggerate the importance of this question, although it may, perhaps, appear dry and technical. We are now upon a clause dealing with the matter of summary jurisdiction, and the proposal is to amend it by the substitution of certain words. With regard to what the hon. and learned Attorney General said on the subject of conspiracy to defraud, I believe that all such cases in Scotland have been dealt with by the ordinary law and the ordinary tribunals; and I am quite sure that it is not for the purpose of striking at any such thing that this Bill is brought in, or that it is proposed to establish summary jurisdiction. I think the Attorney General admitted that, to take part in a conspiracy, was simply to conspire, and that to conspire was to agree to do an unlawful thing. If that is so, why do not the Government accept the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend, and say "conspire." I think that if the words proposed by my hon. and learned Friend were introduced, no one would suppose that something wider was intended; but if the Bill is allowed to remain as it now stands, the Resident Magistrates might be persuaded that a person who had been concerned otherwise than as an agreeing party should be got at under this clause. If the words "take part in" are intended in the proper sense of take part as a party, then, I say, use the word "conspire." It is the danger I have referred to, and which we think exists in the Bill, that makes it right that the words in question should be struck out; and even if the Attorney General is satisfied that nothing more than the words "take part in" should be struck out, the Government ought, I think, to accept the word "conspire." Now, that is the first point which is involved in the Amendment. The next point is the use of the word "criminal." This has been made the subject of discussion already, and I do not propose to go farther into it; but if the word "criminal" is intended to have any efficacy, it should be made clear what that efficacy is, because I apprehend that nothing can be more dangerous than to put before an unskilled tribunal such a word as "criminal" to characterize things which are not in themselves crimes. It is customary in Scotch indictments to use the words "wickedly and feloniously;" but it is held that these are words of style, and that the use of them does not make the thing described by them a "crime," unless it is so apart from the use of these words. If the word which we are considering is only a word of style, and not intended to make a thing criminal which is not in itself criminal, then it ought to be struck out; but if it is meant to characterize as criminal something that was not so before, then, I say, there ought to be some definition of what makes it criminal. If things are to be made crimes which are not in their essence criminal, then you should say so; but, in that case, the words ought not to be used. Again, if what is meant is only to characterize the thing as criminal, if done by criminal means, we ought to know what these means are, and what my hon. and learned Friend's Amendment proposes is that the clause should tell us the means, so that a magistrate may know whether an act is done by means which are illegal or not. This is a matter of great importance, and it is particularly so in view of the kind of tribunal by which the Bill will be administered. The hon. and learned Attorney General, in answer to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for South

Hackney (Sir Charles Russell), endeavoured to deal with the argument that an Act which might be safely administered by a higher tribunal, and a jury, might not be so safe if administered by Resident Magistrates. I understand the Attorney General to say that the value of a jury consists in this—that the jury is a good judge of fact, although it might not be a good judge of law, and that the Resident Magistrates of Ireland are to be assimilated to a jury on account of their ability to judge of facts, although not of law. I do not suppose that anyone would say that an average jury is so good a judge of fact, pure and simple, as a Judge; but then a jury brings in other elements, one of which is a common-sense way of looking at things. The great complaint with reference to Resident Magistrates is that they would not introduce into the administration of the Criminal Law the mitigating and common-sense elements which the jury introduce; but, on the contrary, they would add a new terror to it. I say, therefore, when you are confiding a novel jurisdiction to novel administrators, you ought to give these administrators the clearest instructions as to what they have to do. I believe there is no offence known to the Criminal Law surrounded by so much difficulty and delicacy as that which is called conspiracy. If the question is whether a man has picked a pocket or committed an assault, there is no delicacy about that; but when you are considering whether he is guilty of conspiracy, that is to say, whether he has conspired to do something unlawful, you get into a very delicate region. Therefore, when you have to deal with so subtle a matter as you may have to deal with under this clause, there ought to be no doubt left either as to the character of the acts intended to be struck at, or as to the means by which they are to be reached. For these reasons, I shall support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Hackney, as the only available safeguard in this very special and difficult matter.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Hackney involves two distinct points; first, there is the point, which has been to some extent already discussed, as to what is the effect of using the words "take part in," as distinguished from the technical term

"conspire;" and the second point is, what is the meaning to be attached to the word "criminal." If the Government mean that to "take part in a criminal conspiracy" is the same as "conspiracy," I ask whether they should not put that meaning into the Bill? If they really mean that these words are to be read in this way, that they only apply to persons who are parties to a criminal conspiracy, then there is no great difference between and "criminally conspiring." The terms are practically synonymous, and, therefore, there can be no reason why the Amendment should not be adopted. But I do urge upon the Government not to leave the clause in its present form. It is all very well for hon. and learned Gentlemen to get up and say what they intend to do; but there is the greatest reason to suppose that the Resident Magistrates will be very far from accepting the view of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. My opinion is, that the clause, as at present constructed, will allow innocent persons to be convicted. The Government say that they have no desire to have the clause construed so as to affect innocent persons; but where you have a Resident Magistrate administering the clause, he may come to the conclusion that, in certain cases, he might convict persons who have no guilty knowledge in the matter. It was that which I had in view when I moved an Amendment to a former subsection; but, of course, I do not wish to go back to that. I say that if the Government intend that the section should be limited in the manner pointed out by the Attorney General for England, I think they should not confine their intentions to mere expressions in this House, but embody them in unambiguous words in the clause itself. We then come to the argument turning on the word "criminal," and it appears to me that on this point the contention of the late Lord Advocate (Mr. J. B. Balfour) is simply unanswerable. He said that the word "criminal" is used in one of two ways; it is used either with the object of making acts criminal which have been regarded hitherto as innocent, or it is used as a definition. If the word is used in the first sense, I cannot imagine any more serious act on the part of the Government than to come down to the House and seek to introduce so great a change by this means. If the Government wished to make certain combinations illegal, and to make it illegal to combine under any circumstances, then I say that they are bound to express their intention by distinct and express enactment, and should not attempt to make so great a change in the law by the mere introduction of an adjective into this Bill. I say it is clear that by the use of this word the Government intend to effect a great change in the law. I am content to believe they do not mean to do anything with regard to the Bill in an equivocal sense; but then we are driven on to the second horn of the dilemma of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the late Lord Advocate. If the word is used as a definition, then I can imagine no worse mode of drafting a Bill, and the remedy for that loose draftsmanship is that pointed out by the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Hackney (Sir Charles Russell). If the Government mean to draw a distinction between criminal conspiracies and conspiracies that are not criminal, they should select the form of combination which they wish to strike at, and expressly define what that form of combination is. Let them tell us what is the particular species of conspiracy which they consider criminal, and then we shall be prepared to discuss the matter on more equal terms. The Amendment before the Committee attempts a definition of this kind; it limits the species of criminal conspiracies which can be struck at under this clause to the overt acts pointed at in this clause. Now, if the definition of threats and intimidation is not sufficiently wide, let them tell us what it is they mean to strike at. This is a perfectly clear demand, and I think it is one to which we should have some answer further than that which has been given by the Attorney General. The Attorney General for England has suggested the word "fraud," and if the Government want to introduce that, I do not suppose there will be any strong objection to their doing so. At any rate, if they wish the wording of the clause extended, let them extend it, provided that they, in some manner, define what is the class of conspiracies at which they want to strike. There has been a considerable amount of argument on this word "criminal," and if the Irish Resident Magistrates are in the same state of doubt and difficulty on the subject as has hitherto prevailed on the two Front Benches, I imagine they will have rather a distressing time of it. But, for my part, I think there has been some confusion in this matter. It has been put forward that the words "criminal conspiracy" has no more meaning than the words "criminal arson" or "criminal burglary," and the Attorney General replied to that by referring to a book on the subject. My view is that there ought to be no difference of opinion about the matter. It is true that in speaking of conspiracy lawyers have more or less used the phrase "criminal conspiracy" instead of stating what the criminality is; but it does not follow that the superfluous words have no meaning. Lawyers have used the words "criminal conspiracy," but, so far as I am able to judge, the word "conspiracy" is never used to apply to innocent combinations; and if the word "criminal conspiracy" are only used where conspiracy is meant, I say that the words have, in my judgment, no force in themselves. There are no such offences as criminal and uncriminal conspiracy in practice, whatever the theory may be. The term "criminal conspiracy" does not enable anyone to discriminate between certain classes of combinations, and say this is criminal and this is not criminal; and, therefore, unless the Government wish to introduce an enormous difficulty in the construing of this clause, they are bound to define to what class of conspiracy they refer, and not content themselves with standing on the words of the Bill. That brings us to the consideration of the question as to what classes of conspiracies are to be included in this clause; and on that point it seems to me that the Government, on their own case, are not entitled to any larger scope in the section than that pointed out in the Amendment. Their case is that intimidation prevails in Ireland, and that the tenants are compelled to enter into conspiracy to Boycott people in order to induce them not to pay rent. That is their whole case as stated in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who said that such a state of intimidation prevailed that persons in Ireland are compelled to go into conspiracies to induce others by Boycotting not to hire or take land. That being the mischief which they say is struck at by this clause, I am of opinion that the House of Commons will be doing wisely in limiting the remedy proposed to be applied to the particular mischief of the section.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I do not expect to be able to make any impression on the Government, because I am afraid that in respect of all the clauses of the Bill they will decline to listen to any Amendment; but I rise to express my adherence to the views of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell), and to say that I regard this as a very dangerous clause, and one which ought to be amended. The first objection I have is that the words are used—"any person who shall take part in any criminal conspiracy." Now, the argument has already been put forward by my hon. and learned Friend; but I observed that the Attorney General, in answering him, did not attempt to deny the accuracy of his statements. The hon. and learned Gentleman pointed out that taking part in a criminal conspiracy might be the same thing as conspiring. The Attorney General said it was the same thing, but he declined to go further and say why, if the two things are similar, the Government decline to leave out the words "take part in." I should like to ask the hon. and learned Attorney General why he insists upon using those words instead of the simple word "conspire?" And again, to repeat what was said by the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney, will he give us any authority to show that those words have been used before? There might be a conspiracy—for example, a combination to commit murder like the Ku Klux conspiracy—and there might be many degrees of guilt or innocence in those who took part in it. A man who conspires would have been one of the persons actually taking part in a combination for the commission of murder; but a man who takes part in a criminal conspiracy may be one who takes part in something quite different. There are, as I have said, many degrees of guilt, and using language of this kind, which is not legal language, might lead the Resident Magistrate to say that, although that man had not conspired, he, nevertheless, took part in that which is conspiracy for the commission of an offence; and therefore I hope the Attorney General will explain why it is we are not to have the word "conspire," instead of the words "taking part in a criminal conspiracy." I will now turn to another point mentioned by my hon. and learned Friend which was not met by the Attorney General for England. My hon. and learned Friend pointed out that it was exceedingly important to define the particular kind of conspiracies which were to be determined by the Resident Magistrate, and the Attorney General said that the Law of Conspiracy is very difficult of definition. It is so difficult that I believe those on the two Front Benches will not be able to define in what conspiracy consists. If that is so, I think the Government should determine what is the nature of the offence aimed at by this section, and curiously enough they have attempted to do so—it is not persons who conspire not to perform their legal obligations, but those who conspire to make others not perform their legal obligations. He would be a bold man indeed who should endeavour to codify the law with respect to conspiracy, and I should be sorry to take any part in an attempt to do so. The answer of the Attorney General for England to this Amendment is a very short one. He said it is quite true you are asking us to define conspiracy; but what are the reasons why you ask us to do that? The reason you put forward is that the safeguard of the jury is withdrawn, and it is perfectly true that the safeguard of the jury is of exceeding great importance, because whether the offence is punishable or not, it is a mixed question of law and fact. But the Attorney General seems to think that we have an excellent substitute for the jury in the Resident Magistrates, who, he says, are excellent judges of fact. I ask why, if they are excellent judges of fact in the delicate case of conspiracy, they should not be made judges of fact in England, Scotland, and Wales? But the truth is, a safeguard is required, not because we are disposed to impeach the integrity of those gentlemen, but because we do not think they are in touch with the people of the country, which is that which makes trial by jury so valuable elsewhere. If it is true that the words "take part in criminal conspiracy" are dangerous, and that danger is not removed by the Attorney General placing on the Paper an Amendment to say that the conspiracy contemplated here must be a conspiracy now punishable by law, because, in the case of innocent agents, there is no protection, unless you extend to them that protection which you refuse to extend to them, by inserting such words as "wilful," or "knowingly." It is that which makes this clause so formidable. Therefore, I say, do let us try to get rid of the danger of employing empty, vague, and general language in this clause. The last part of the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend has the words "conspire by violence and intimidation." No doubt violence and intimidation are two really formidable methods by which conspiracy is carried out. But conspiracy might be carried out by persuasion, and that is not the sort of thing which ought to be struck at by exceptional legislation, nor the kind of thing which is dangerous to anyone. Therefore, I ask that there may be a definition here, and it would be almost better to have any definition than to have none. If the words which the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney proposes are not sufficiently wide, let the Government suggest others if they will, but do not leave the clause undefined and doubtful in character in reference to an offence which is difficult and impossible of definition. I ask the Attorney General again why the words "taking part in a criminal conspiracy" are put into this clause, and why he will not define those particular phases of offence which it appears are to be submitted to summary jurisdiction.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The first point of the hon. Member opposite is that we have used the words "take part in a criminal conspiracy" instead of the word "conspire;" and in the next place, he asks me to define the nature of the conspiracies which are to be submitted to summary jurisdiction. I do not regard the words used as contrasted with the word "conspire" as anything more than a choice of expression. I am aware that the words "unlawful combination" sometimes occur; but with a large experience in the administration of the Criminal Law, I am of opinion that an indictment would be perfectly good in the words we have made use of. As I have said, the words in the clause "take part in a criminal conspiracy" and the word "conspire" mean precisely the same thing; and as far as our knowledge of the law goes, make no difference whatever. The hon. and learned Gentleman has argued that a conspiracy is a thing criminal in itself, and that it was absurd to speak of "criminal conspiracy," as it would be to speak of criminal burglary or criminal arson. I do not agree with that. I find that the words "conspiracy" and "combination" are interchangeable in Acts of Parliament. We all know very well that there are innocent combinations and criminal combinations—innocent conspiracies and criminal conspiracies. Hon. Gentlemen opposite have charged us sometimes with taking part in a conspiracy of silence, and in doing so, I presume the charge made against us is not of an indictable character; and we, on the other hand, have sometimes retorted that there was on their side a conspiracy to talk, but I would not mean by that they were engaged in a criminal act. It is for the purpose of removing the doubt which might exist in some minds, that the Attorney General for England has put down the words "punishable by law." The hon. and learned Member asks us to define the offence which is to be submitted to summary jurisdiction; but the subject is too wide for definition, and were we to attempt to do so, we should fall into the very vice which the hon. and learned Member has referred to. The intention of the Government is that where there is an unlawful object aimed at by conspiracy, the conspiracy to get that object will be the offence dealt with summarily under this Act.

MR. J. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.): The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has, I venture to think, not given us any further information upon the point which we say must, if possible, be cleared up before these powers are entrusted to Resident Magistrates. Now, a great difficulty is felt over the word "criminal." What is the answer the Attorney General for Ireland, in his able argument, has given? His answer is that it is necessary to have that word, and the reason which he assigns is this—in order that all conspiracies that are now punishable should be punishable under this clause. Unfortunately, this power is to be given to a tribunal the most unfitted in the world for defining conspiracy. Surely, according to the conviction of hon. Gentlemen opposite, these offences have gone on long enough in Ireland to enable them to make up their minds what are the conspiracies which are being committed in Ireland. It is said it is difficult to define or codify the Law of Conspiracy. I agree. I do not think it is so impossible, but I agree it is difficult. But the particular kinds of conspiracies and offences which have been occurring, and are said to be now occurring in Ireland, are surely by this time known, and can be defined. Well, why is it that the definition is avoided? Surely it is not at all desirable that these gentlemen—whom I will not again describe, because, however honourable they may be, it is already shown they are totally unfit for finding out the niceties and intricacies of so refined a law as the Law of Conspiracy, a law which puzzles Judges, counsel, and juries, and which, even now, according to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, it is impossible to accurately and definitely explain—surely it is very undesirable that these gentlemen should be left to construe an Act of Parliament of this kind—I mean without any guide being given to them as to what it is that you desire to draw within the purview of this clause. Well now, under this clause, some of these gentlemen who are not lawyers may take the view pointed out by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid), that is, that if a man simply posts a letter which contains a conspiracy he takes part in the conspiracy. It is quite possible that these learned or unlearned ex-Majors and Captains of the Army will be guided by policemen, who may say to them—"Sir, I assure you that the prisoner did take part in this conspiracy, for he carried the conspiracy to the Post Office." Evidently that is not intended. Now, let us see what is intended. Suppose that there should be an eviction, or a series of evictions, in a particular district. Examples of the cruelty of evictions have been often in the course of this Session brought before the House. Well, Sir, suppose that where some of these evictions occurred, the people are so shocked at what has taken place that they agree with one accord that no man ought to tender for or hire a certain piece of land. Will that of itself be conspiracy; will it be sufficient to be a criminal conspiracy, if it comes into a Criminal Court? All this vagueness is left to the gentlemen who are to decide upon this clause. Now, let us go one step further, and see whether it is absolutely necessary this crime should be strictly defined. I do not say that conspiracy should be absolutely codified, but that it should be more defined. By this Amendment it is proposed to take out the words "take part in any criminal conspiracy," and insert "conspire by violence or intimidation." Now, it is clear, except to those who will not see, that if a man conspires by violence and if he conspires by intimidation, that is unlawful; but do Gentlemen opposite say that you may unlawfully conspire without using any violence or any intimidation? ["Yes!"] Then how—we want to know how? Over and over again we find that ordinary Acts of Parliament are passed without proper definitions, and with an imperfect laying down of what the intention of the Legislature is. What is the consequence? Infinite delay, very great expense, over and over again clients are nearly ruined, and over and over again learned Judges complain that the Legislature has been lax in not strictly defining their intention. If that be so in civil matters, surely, when you are creating crime, creating punishment for crime, and over and above this, giving the power of summary jurisdiction to such men as the Irish Resident Magistrates, it is essentially necessary that some more careful definition should be attempted. Now, Sir, the difficulty of defining conspiracy under the Common Law is that the Common Law is a thing which has grown up under the administration of learned Judges for a long time, and that learned Judges have applied to new circumstances what they conceive to be old principles of law. But they are just as liable to be wrong in that application as to be wrong in any decision which they may honestly and ably give every day of their lives, and upon which they are every day corrected by Courts of Appeal and by the House of Lords. Therefore, without, in any degree, impugning the ability or the wisdom of the learned Judges, mistakes are inevitably liable to occur; and when this Legislature is asked to recognize this fine Judge-made and Judge-explained Law of Conspiracy—which has gone the length of saying some things which many of us think contrary to sense—I think it is time to pause and adopt the course which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for South Hackney (Sir Charles Russell) has suggested. For instance, it is held that each of two men may do a thing singly and their action may be perfectly lawful, yet if they co-operate to do the same thing their action will be held to be a criminal conspiracy. When such a doctrine is laid down, and the Legislature is asked to confirm such a doctrine, and at the same time to set aside the ordinary law and the ordinary tribunal, which is a jury, and to relegate matters to persons unlearned and unversed in the law, I think it is time to consider seriously the proposal of my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Charles Russell). Now, let us see how fair this proposition is. My hon. and learned Friend does not propose to interfere in any respect with any Judge-made law, or any Law of Conspiracy which stands. Whatever law there is at present in this country, or in Ireland or Scotland, that law will continue. A man will have to be indicted—he will have to be tried before a learned Judge, and he will have to be tried before a jury. It is impossible to blink the fact that juries over and over again will not accept from learned Judges any law which is contrary to their feelings of justice and common sense. Over and over again they have, contrary to judicial guidance, strained a point in favour of a prisoner in order to bring him in not guilty, because from their view the law, as laid down by the Judge, has been contrary to their sense of right and justice. That safeguard is to be taken away, and therefore it is extremely advisable that the definition proposed by my hon. and learned Friend should be made. Now, if it be a matter so plain to my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke), let him tell us this—if there be any conspiracy in Ireland known among the Irish nation proper to be put down under this Bill which does not come within the scope of the words "conspiracy by violence or conspiracy by intimidation" let him tell us what it is. It will not do to tell us it is conspiracy not to hire a man's land—or for two or more to interchange their purpose not to hire the land, and their opinion that it ought not to be hired—because, that by itself, is no offence. If my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General had ever so many fine estates, and I and those who sit around me declined to take any of them, he surely would not construe our action into a breach of the law. Surely it would not be contended that it is an offence for a man to say—"I will not deal with So-and-so and I will not work with So-and-so," and for his neighbour to say, "That is my own view too." I want to know what are the circumstances and the nature of the violence or intimidation which will make perfectly lawful acts unlawful. I trust that some responsible person on the Government Bench should say why it is that, short of codifying the law, some attempt cannot be made to define what they mean and intend by conspiracy under the particular circumstances of this Bill.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. J. Shiress Will) and other hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway who have spoken on this Amendment have very greatly relieved Irish Members. Only one of my Colleagues (Mr. Maurice Healy) has as yet spoken upon this Amendment, and he spoke at a time when very few hon. Members were present. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. J. Shiress Will) has referred to the character of conspiracy. We on these Benches have never heard of any complaint in Ireland except against conspiracy accompanied by violence and intimidation—the warmest newspaper opposed to us has never mentioned any other kind of criminal conspiracy. It is quite impossible to apply to many of the combinations which now exist the definitions of conspiracy which have come down from times when other and very different combinations were in the minds of the men who made the definitions. The habit of men combining together or working together in various forms has become an acknowledged fact in these days; but it is impossible to conceive the application of the old definitions of conspiracy to such combinations. There is not the slightest doubt that what the Government really desire is to secure to the landlords of Ireland their rents. They aim at the combinations which the tenants have formed to resist the excessive rents; but why not attempt to put down conspiracies on the part of landlords to make men take their farms and to work with persons they have an objection to work with? Why should a man pay his rent before he pays any other debt he owes? We have got at the naked truth, and got it out of the mouth of a responsible Member of the Irish Executive, that the object of this clause is not to deal with conspiracy as conspiracy, but to deal with tenants as against landlords. At one moment I thought the Attorney General for Ireland was going to say he did not agree with the Attorney General for England in his definition or explanation of the words "take part in." The right hon. and learned Gentleman said these words mean "engage in;" but the Attorney General for England said they mean "party to an agreement." Any person who is acquainted with the English language must admit that the words "any person who shall take part in" mean that a person must take an active or principal part in an act. The effect of the unanswerable arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Sir Charles Russell) has been to make it clear that the Government mean "to conspire;" but they will not say so. Why are we so anxious to call attention to the words "take part in?" Because it is now plain that it is the means or the weapons used in the alleged conspiracy which are to be left to the discretion of the magistrate—this functionary is to declare whether the means are legal or illegal. A man may agree with the object and disagree with the means, or he may agree with part of one and part of the other, and yet he may be held to "take part in" the conspiracy. These words, I am sure, have not been framed by a lawyer, but have been sent over from Ireland by men who have a distinct object in framing the clause in this way. Now, if proof is given to a Resident Magistrate that the tenants on a certain estate are backward with their rent, and one man is suspected to be the leader of the tenants in the revolt against exorbitant rents, that man will undoubtedly have the torture of the first section applied to him. He will say—"I did not pay my rent." And then it will be said—"You are taking part in a conspiracy." He will be punished for a perfectly legal act—an act he is quite at liberty to do. Let me cite another case. It is well known that in Ulster many farms have been for 12 and 15 years left vacant, rather than that the Ulster Tenant Right Custom should be broken. The farm next to mine may be vacant. It may be a very desirable farm to have; but I do not care to take it; and it is not taken by anyone else. It is very likely to be held that there is a conspiracy not to take the farm, and that I am taking part in it. If tenants do not do exactly as landlords wish them, they will assuredly be held to be guilty of conspiracy. It is quite evident that the Government are bringing in this Bill for the purpose of compelling men to pay in full rents which it is impossible for them to pay, consistently with the times that we live in. I think the Committee has a right to insist upon some further explanation why these very extraordinary words are used, and why we are not to revert to the ordinary technical words which have been always used in criminal Statutes to define offences.

MR. CLANCOY (Dublin Co., N.): The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) stated, in reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid), that this is a mere question of choice of words—a mere question of the choice between the words "take part in a criminal conspiracy" and "conspire." We often hear complaints about our debates being prolonged for useless purposes; but I never heard a more singular example of the prolongation of debate than that afforded by the speech of the Attorney General for Ireland. This debate has now proceeded for an hour and a-half over what the right hon. and learned Gentleman calls a mere choice of expression. [Ministerial cries of "Hear, hear!"] Yes; prolonged by the Members of the Government. They admit that the words, "take part in a criminal conspiracy," are precisely the same in meaning and intent as "conspire;" but they are prepared to prolong the debate rather than to consent to substitute for the words, "take part in a criminal conspiracy," the simple word "conspire." I suppose that they are quite prepared to debate the question for another hour and a-half, rather than to give in to the Opposition. They have refused to answer the question put to them by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid). The Attorney General for Ireland rose with the express intention of answering the hon. and learned Gentleman frankly; but the Committee will bear in mind that from the beginning to the end of his speech he never gave a trace of an answer to the question why he prefers the words "take part in a criminal conspiracy" to "conspire." We know the reason perfectly well. We know perfectly well that it is in order to include, under the section, several offences which are not offences according to law, but are simply offences in the eyes of the landlord or the minions of Dublin Castle—to include offences which regular Courts of Law would not tolerate being brought before them. The Government are asked why they do not define the word "conspiracy"—they are ready enough to define other terms under the section. At the end of the Bill they indulge in several definitions; they define the words "Lord Lieutenant;" they define the most simple expressions that can possibly be thought of. They define, as I say, the words "Lord Lieutenant;" they define "county;" they define the words "Court of Assize;" they define the expression "Attorney General;" they define the words "writ of possession;" they define what is an aggravated crime of violence against a person; they define the word "intimidation;" and they define the words "the Whiteboy Acts." But one thing at which they stop is a definition of the very elastic word "conspiracy;" that is a very suspicious circumstance. The explanation is that hitherto the Government and the landlords have been saying things have been done in Ireland by intimidation which were not done by intimidation at all, and that if they were compelled to go into Court to prove that things had been done by intimidation it would soon be found that the charge was unfounded. The result is that they bring in a Bill framed in such a manner that they need not prove a legal offence at all, but simply leave it to the discretion of magistrates, who are neither learned nor fair, to define whether offences have been committed or not. It seems to me that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) gave up the whole case, because he said in his speech—"If we assume that the Resident Magistrates in Ireland are unfit to discharge these delicate duties I admit this clause is badly framed." The hon. and learned Gentleman assumed that the Resident Magistrates of Ireland are fit to discharge these duties. Our assumption is that they are utterly unfit—our assumption is that they are not only incapacitated from discharging these duties from want of legal knowledge, but that they are a set of partizans; and my personal conviction is, judging from all I have heard of them, that not only are they partizans, but they are corrupt. Our belief, founded on experience, is that these Resident Magistrates are capable of being bribed, and have been bribed. No kind of bribery is more common than rewards for special services. The Resident Magistrates who, in the past, have been most active in the oppression of the people are precisely the Resident Magistrates who have been promoted; and there is not the least doubt in the world that under this Act the Resident Magistrate who shows himself most zealous in giving the widest possible interpretation to this Act, and in gathering into his net the greatest possible number of Nationalists, will receive the greatest bribe in the shape of reward and promotion. Sir, we have now had several successive illustrations of the real meaning of this Act. The real intention of the promoters of this Act is not to put down crime and outrage, but to put down political and social combination; and that, I am sure, the English people are beginning to understand. It is impossible any longer to conceive that the object aimed at in this Act is simply and solely to put down crime and punish criminals, an object we do not object to, an object we would help them in accomplishing, because crime is not an advantage to us, as has been clearly shown at various elections. The Home Rule majority at the election yesterday would probably have been much greater if these charges of crime and outrage had not been repeated by Liberal Unionists and others. This Bill is not brought in to put down crime and punish criminals, but to put down political combination. That is the evident object of this Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging this debate, but, as far as I can, of contributing to the conclusion of it. I think the opinion that we entertain upon this side of the House is that, as far as argument has gone, we have not had the worst of it. We are very willing that the judgment should be taken upon that argument. Now, there is one point in this discussion which, I think, ought to be made perfectly clear. The Government, from the earliest time when this matter was brought into debate, have rested upon their phrase "criminal conspiracy." Now, at the very earliest period, I challenged the Law Officers of the Government to show any example in which, in any Statute or in any indictment, the words "criminal conspiracy" appear. They have failed to meet that challenge. They cannot show that the words "criminal conspiracy" is a phrase known to the law, to which any definite meaning can be attached according to any interpretation which has been given to it by legal decisions. Well, then, what is the conclusion from that? It is that they are introducing a new phrase which will carry with it a new offence, and which must be subjected to a new interpretation. Now, that cannot be denied, and unless they are prepared to meet my challenge that is a thing which must go uncontradicted. They admit that if it were not for the word "criminal" they could not defend this clause. According to their allegation, they are not prepared to defend the clause if the word "conspiracy" stands alone. Then they say—"Oh, the introduction of the word 'criminal' alters the whole thing, and that is the thing upon which we are prepared to stand." Therefore, they have introduced a new legal phrase.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman has overlooked Amendment No. 25.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Oh, the offences are to be "now punishable by law." That means a conspiracy according to the existing interpretation of Common Law. If that is what you mean, why introduce the word "criminal?" For what reason is this new phrase introduced? But I will take you upon your own ground. What you stand upon is the Common Law of Conspiracy now punishable by the Common Law. That is the very thing against which Parliament legislated in 1875,

Mr. Clancy

It was conspiracy punishable by law as interpreted by the Judges, which was condemned in the year 1875 as applied to the labourers of England. We say that to apply the Common Law of Conspiracy, as interpreted by the Judges, to the tenants of Ireland, would be equally unjust, and against that we protest. But, whenever we use that argument, you say—"Oh, no; that cannot be so, because we say criminal conspiracy, and that means something different." Well, if it means something different, tell us what it means? If you introduce a new phrase into the law of the country you are bound to define it, and if you do not attempt to do so we have a right to attempt in the Interpretation Clause to say what a "criminal conspiracy" means. We have a right to challenge a new phrase introduced by you into the law, and say what "criminal conspiracy" shall mean and what it shall not mean. If it means the Common Law of Conspiracy now punishable by law, we say that would be a most unjust law to apply to the combinations of tenants in Ireland. The question we have a right to put to the Government is this—what do you mean by conspiracy which is not criminal? If you say that criminal conspiracy is the thing you are aiming at, tell us what is a conspiracy which is not criminal? I shall like very much to hear a definition of conspiracy from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke). The word "conspiracy" in the law is a very old word; you find it in the works of Lord Coke referring to legislation of a much earlier period. The phrase "conspiracy" is to be found in the Statutes passed in the time of the Plantagenets, but no such phrase as "criminal conspiracy" is to be found in any Statutes. It is very difficult to assert a negative, but I invite the Government to cite a positive and to give us proof; I confess my ignorance. If they are able to produce Statutes, or to produce an indictment which contains this phrase "criminal conspiracy" upon which they rest, something may be said for the clause. I do not at all agree that the title of a book is sufficient ground for the introduction of this phrase in legislation; you cannot import titles of books into indictments; therefore, I challenge you to say what you mean by this phrase "criminal conspiracy." I have challenged you three or four times, and you have never ventured to answer me. If that be so, and if you can give no example from Statute, indictment, or judgment of Courts, we have a right to demand that upon the face of this Statute you shall give a meaning to this phrase which you, for the first time, import, and which you say is the significance of your Bill. I again ask the question, if "criminal conspiracy" are the patent words, explain to me what that conspiracy is which is not criminal? That is a very plain and clear question, and I should like to have an answer to it. Let the Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke), or let any of the numerous Law Officers who sit upon the Government Bench, give us an example of conspiracy which is not criminal in English law. If you mean by conspiracy unlawful combination, why do you not say so? That is a very plain and clear issue. This Amendment is moved in order to make it clear what is meant by conspiracy against which you are directing this Act. It is very necessary that the people who are to be affected by this Act should have a clear understanding what they may and what they may not do; and we say it is most unfair that people in the position of the tenants of Ireland should be exposed to the penalties provided for in this Act unless some definite information is vouchsafed to them as to the meaning of the Act. It is quite clear you are not prepared to say what are the things you will allow and what are the things which you will not allow. What are the combinations which the tenants of Ireland may enter into in reference to land—in reference to the occupation of land and the owners of land—which the Government assert are lawful, and what are those which the Government assert to be unlawful and criminal? In the absence of any answer to that we have a right to claim that this proposal of yours is an unfair proposal, and that it is a proposal made against the tenants of Ireland, and made in the interests of the landlords of Ireland; that it is spreading a net which is intended to be cast round the tenants of Ireland, which is intended to operate exclusively in favour of the landlords of Ireland; that it is a law made by the landlords for the landlords, and that it will be administered by the agents of the landlords. That is our distinct declaration upon this clause, and your failure to give any instance of what you regard as lawful combination and what you are prepared to treat a criminal conspiracy, is a proof to us that we are right in the interpretation we have placed upon this clause.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): Sir, I rise now instead of my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General (Sir Edward Clarke), because I really think the argument has gone beyond the phase of any technical legal discussion. This is the third time we have discussed the same question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) prides himself that he has got much the best of the argument. I will not dispute that now; but I will only call the fact to the mind of the Committee that the right hon. Gentleman is hardly in a position to say whether his side has got the best of the argument or not, because, unless I am very much mistaken, he has not been in the House during the time the argument has been going on, and he neither heard the most able and temperate speech of my hon. and learned Friend the late Attorney General (Sir Charles Russell), a speech to which I listened with the greatest admiration, nor the reply, on which we rest our case, of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster). Not having heard either the case for the prosecution or the case for the defence, he is, I venture to think, hardly in a position to say that he has got the best of the argument. I am not going to discuss whether we ought or ought not to introduce into this clause the expression "criminal conspiracy." That the expression is not a foolish expression from a legal point of view is shown by the fact that the greatest legal authority on this subject uses it in the title and uses it on every page of his book. Whether there is or is not precedent in any Statute for the use of the phrase, the fact that an eminent legal writer has distinguished criminal conspiracy from conspiracy which presumably is not criminal is a proof, at all events, that the phrase is not nonsense. But, apart from that, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) has argued the whole case as if my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) had not put down upon the Paper Amendment No. 25.

Sir William Harcourt

If there was any ambiguity before as to what we meant was criminal conspiracy that ambiguity is wholly removed, or will be removed when my right hon. and learned Friend has introduced into the Bill the Amendment of which he has given Notice. Therefore, I think that any argument founded upon any supposed or presumed doubt as to what class of offences is aimed at by this clause is entirely out of place. Is it too much to ask that we should now proceed to a Division? The hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin County (Mr. Clancy) told us that we have been talking for two hours upon an Amendment respecting a mere choice of expression. Well, Sir, two hours are surely enough to decide the choice of an expression; and, therefore, I respectfully ask that we should now come to a decision upon the point.

Question put.

THE CHAIRMAN: The decision come to by the Committee disposes of Amendment 21, "page 2, line 17, after 'take' insert 'active;'" Amendment 23, "page 2, line 17, leave out 'criminal;'" and 24, "page 2, line 17, leave out 'criminal conspiracy,' and insert 'conspiracy by acts in themselves criminal.'" I am unable to attribute any meaning to Amendment 22, "page 2, line 17, after 'part' insert 'in conjunction with other persons;'" and, therefore, the Committee will proceed to Amendment No. 25.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 17, after "conspiracy," insert "now punishable by Law."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I rise, Sir, for the purpose of pointing out and placing beyond all doubt the conspiracies which are to be punishable by the Summary Jurisdiction Courts under his clause. I intend to give all the opposition in my power to this Amendment, and the reason why I propose to do so will be very easily seen. I do it on two grounds—in the first place, because I think it is an illusory conceasion to this side of the House—in fact, that it is no concession at all; and, secondly, because it defines more clearly the conspiracies at which the Government are aiming by this clause. It has already been pointed out, very often in the course of these debates, what an enormous change has been made in the administration of the Criminal Law of Ireland by removing from the people of Ireland the protection of Judge and jury in cases of “criminal conspiracy.” In spite of all that has been said against removing from the people of Ireland this protection, and in spite of all that has been said about the tremendous change that this clause will make in the position of everybody engaged in political work in Ireland, all the concession that the Government is prepared to offer is contained in the words—

“That no conspiracy shall be dealt with under this section of the Act that is not already punishable by Law.”

Now, Sir, we have only to return to the Charge of Judge Fitzgerald, and the Charges of Judge Murphy and Judge O'Brien, in order to know what are the conspiracies which are now punishable by law in Ireland. Of course, this subsection, as amended by the Attorney General's Amendment, would be interpreted not as looking towards such conspiracy as is practically punishable in Ireland—that is to say, such conspiracy as it has been found practicable or possible to get punished by the machinery of Judge and jury; but it applies to such conspiracies as, according to the law laid down by the Irish Judges, the juries ought to convict for, and which ought to be punished by law. And we have laid down, as has been said more than once in the most clear and unmistakable language, what the character of these conspiracies is; and in order to bring home as forcibly and clearly as possible to hon. Members the character of the legislation they are engaged in, I will read once more the language of Judge Fitzgerald on this point. Before I do so, however, I desire to point out that the language of Judge Fitzgerald, so often quoted in this House, is clearly and unmistakably different, and different in most important particulars, from the language of the Attorney General for England when laying down the law in this House the other day. I listened with the utmost attention to the Attorney General for England when he was laying down what he considered to be the Law of Conspiracy as professed or laid down in this country; and I am perfectly certain that the law, as laid down by him, was clearly and distinctly different from the law as laid down by the Irish Judges. Judge Fitzgerald, in laying that down, as we know, said that it was conspiracy for two or more individuals to join together to do an act which, if done by one individual, would be nothing more than a civil wrong; and he instanced the fact that for one tenant to withhold his rent was not in any degree criminal, but only a civil trespass; while for two or more tenants in concert to withhold their rents was conspiracy. Judge Fitzgerald did not use the words “criminal conspiracy;” but he said it was a conspiracy punishable at Common Law. Now, what does that entail? It entails that this concession of the Government leaves it open to these Courts of Summary Jurisdiction in Ireland to hold it to be conspiracy—or, if they will have it, “criminal conspiracy”—for two or more tenants to combine and confederate together for the purpose of bringing about a reduction of rents. There can be no doubt that the Government have in their minds the using of this Act for that purpose, and to punish as guilty of criminal conspiracy tenants who withhold their rents, or men who advise tenants to withhold their rents, for that case also was dealt with in Judge Fitzgerald's Charge. I invite the Attorney General to tell the Committee whether such offences are not “now punishable by law,” as the law stands at the present time, and whether it will not be punishable by these Summary Jurisdiction Courts? I would ask the Attorney General to say whether, if two or more tenants withhold their rents, or if anyone advises them to do so, such conspiracy would not be conspiracy punishable by the Common Law in Ireland? Let us consider, for one moment, how this clause would work in Ireland. Combinations of tenants to withhold their rents, with the object of getting their rents reduced, you must recollect are by no means confined to the National Party in Ireland. You must remember that combinations of tenants to withhold their rents for the purpose of bringing about reductions are looked upon all over Ireland, by men of all religions and by men of all politics, as perfectly legitimate. Such combinations have been entered into by persons belonging to the Loyal and Patriotic Association—to which the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) belongs—on the estates of the Marquess of Downshire, of the Duke of Abercorn, of the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and on numberless other estates, like Wallace's estate in the North of Ireland, where the tenants are opposed to us in politics. Meetings were held, and resolutions passed at these meetings, frequently moved by Protestant clergymen, the purport of which was that rents should be withheld, in the hope that, by so doing, the landlords would be induced to give reductions. It is true that, in this case, the agitators stopped short in their operations—that is to say, they do not go the length, and did not adopt the courses, that we advised the tenants in the South and West of Ireland to adopt. [“Hear, hear!”] Yes; that is so; they did not go so far as we did; but that fact does not affect my argument in the slightest degree. The action of these persons in the North of Ireland—on the estate of the Duke of Abercorn, for instance—was just as much a conspiracy under the words of this Act as it was for tenants elsewhere to adopt the Plan of Campaign. According to the Charge of Judge Fitzgerald, to combine together to withhold rents, with the object of obtaining a reduction, is conspiracy at Common Law; and whether the conspiracy stops at passing resolutions at public meetings, and whether they stop, as they did, on the Duke of Abercorn's estate—on which, be it said, they succeeded in their object, for after they had withheld their rents for two or three months the tenants got considerable reductions—whether they are content to stop after receiving advantages such as those, or whether they go on to further measures, such as the tenantry who have adopted our advice have taken, I hold that they are guilty of the same conspiracy according to the dicta of the Irish Judges; and what I want to bring home to the Committee is that, by refusing to give us any definition of the crimes and offences that are punishable under this section, they leave it open to the Executive in Ireland, should they so desire to do, to absolute prohibit all public meetings in Ireland called together to consider the subject of the payment of rent. It cannot be denied, if this Amendment is all the limit the Government is prepared to insert in this section, that, from the day the clause passes into law, no meeting of Irish tenants can be held for the purpose of getting reductions of rent without those who take part in it being guilty of criminal conspiracy under this Act, and it will be simply and solely at the discretion of the Castle and the Resident Magistrates whether they shall be punished or not. It may be that men like the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, from motives of decency, not wishing to have their tenants dragged into the Courts, may desire to spare them; but, however they may cherish that desire, this clause will be able to strike these people. Even if such tenants are not affected, we shall have in Ireland what has been done with so much mischief in the past—namely, the tenantry of such and such a Lord spared, whilst the tenantry of other persons, for the same offences, are committed to prison. Where, I ask, are the lines to be drawn which will satisfy anyone's mind as to the difference there will be between a combination on the Marquess of Lansdowne's estate and those on other estates in Ireland? On the Marquess of Lansdowne's estate the tenantry adopted our policy, and the Marquess of Lansdowne had all his legal remedies. When the law came to the doors of the tenants they were put out of their holdings. The tenantry of the Duke of Abercorn did not go so far as we did—they got terms; and will any lawyer point out to me the difference, from a legal point of view, between the combination in the one case and that in the other? I want this clear—that this limitation proposed by the Attorney General is absolutely illusory. It gives us nothing whatever, and as it gives us nothing I shall certainly oppose it to the best of my ability.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. [Ironical Ministerial cheers.] Well, I do not see at all why I should not agree with the hon. Member. I know that hon. Members opposite have laid it down, as a fundamental principle, that on every Irish question it is absolutely necessary to differ from every Representative of Ireland. That is according to their system of government in Ireland. They do not attempt to govern that country according to the opinion of the Irish people. They govern it by the English sword. They do not agree with any representations from the Irish Representatives as to their claim upon the English House of Commons. That is the Tory doctrine, and the principle upon which the present Government propose to govern Ireland. I quite understand that that is not the principle that we adopt. We desire to govern Ireland in accordance with the wishes of the Irish people. You think that a monstrous proposition; but we regard it as a fundamental principle, certainly of the Liberal Party, and I think you yourselves will one of these days find it a necessary principle for the English Government to adopt. That time will most assuredly come. Well, now, with reference to the Amendment of the Attorney General, though I certainly agree, and I repeat it, with the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken that it gives no security at all, we are not here to oppose its introduction. It would be a great mistake to suppose that this Amendment really alters the matter the least in the world. Why it was not originally introduced, and why it is left to this period to be inserted, it is idle, perhaps, now to speculate. It is a curious thing that upon this, one of the most important features of the Bill, the Government have absolutely failed to secure one single word of support from Unionist Liberals in this House. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury, one of the greatest authorities upon the Law of Conspiracy, with whom I have fought the battle for many a year in this House, has been silent upon this question. He has not supported the views of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for England or the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. He could not have done so without having contradicted every word that he said in the year 1873. [Cries of "No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen who are crying "No, no!" never heard the debates in 1873, and know nothing about the Law of Conspiracy, or about the great contests that went on in this House. I say that it would have been impossible for the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury to have supported this clause in accordance with the principle he maintained at that time on the subject of Trades Unions. What is it that the Attorney General's Amendment does? It throws open the whole Law of Conspiracy as expounded by the interpretation of Judges under the Common Law. That was the very thing which worked the whole injustice against the Trades Unions. That which was punishable at Common Law as conspiracy was the very thing complained of, the very thing condemned, and the very thing legislated against in 1873. Then the whole of that law in its injustice is now to be applied to the tenants of Ireland in their combinations without any of that protection which has been given to the English labourer. The Government have refused that protection, and they say that the law which was so applied to the English labourer shall be now applied to the Irish tenant. Well, we have protested against that as best we could; we have laid our arguments before the House and the country; and I do not think there will be any advantage in continuing the discussion further. But I think that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway may be certain of this—that if in the administration of this law the magistrates or Judges of Ireland should ever practically apply to the tenants of Ireland the Common Law of Conspiracy in the way that it was applied to the labourers of England they will find that the public opinion of Great Britain will be arrayed on the side of the tenants of Ireland, and that they will inevitably have the voice of the Legislature brought to bear to reverse their decision, as it was brought to bear to reverse the decision of the Judges as to the Law of Conspiracy in this country. We have made this issue perfectly clear. You have opened up the whole of this loose, mischievous, and oppressive Common Law of Conspiracy which the people of England, after long debates, overruled in favour of the English labourers. You are now going to place that law in the hands of the Resident Magistrates of Ireland, under the influence of the landlords, to apply it to the tenants of Ireland. We cannot, in the present state of the House of Commons, get any remedy here to-day; but so surely as his law is applied, and as soon as injustice in its application is observed in Ireland in the case of the tenants as it was observed in England in the case of the working men, so surely will that remedy be applied, and I think we may be perfectly content to look forward to that time.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): I will not follow the right hon. Gentleman in his disquisition on Home Rule with which he began his observations upon this Amendment. That did not seem to me to be at all relevant, and I will not occupy the time of the Committee by replying to it. Neither will I again go into the question of the Law of Conspiracy, upon which the right hon. Gentleman has spoken now, I believe, about six times. It will suffice if I again repeat to the Committee that the intentions which are accredited to Her Majesty's Government and the framers of this Bill and the Irish Executive, of levelling it not against crime, but against legitimate combinations of Irish tenants, is wholly and absolutely unfounded. It finds no justification either in any utterance of any Member of the Government, or of any Gentleman who adheres to the policy of the Government, nor in any provision which we have introduced into this Bill. Now, I hope the Committee will allow this Amendment to be introduced into the Bill without a Division. The hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) has told us he means to divide against it. I think that surely, from his own point of view, he will be ill-advised to do that. He may think that the limitation or the explanations we have given are inadequate. He may desire further restriction introduced into the Bill; but the Committee have already decided that point. They have decided against further restriction; and that being so, would the hon. Gentleman not be well advised if he allowed us to put the words in the clause which, whether necessary or unnecessary, at all events make it perfectly and absolutely clear what is the view of the Government in framing this clause?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I also am of the same opinion as the hon. Member for East Mayo. But I go beyond the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and I think that we should oppose the introduction of these words. It appears to me that the words are mere tautology. We have in the clause the words "criminal conspiracy," and what, I ask, is "criminal conspiracy" but a conspiracy punishable by law? [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] This Amendment is clearly tautology. Well, if these words are tautology and unnecessary, on the other hand, they accentuate that which we ought to object to—namely, the introduction into this Bill of the vague and indefinite Law of Conspiracy, instead of giving us what we have pressed the Government for—namely, some definition of the conspiracy to which this measure is to apply. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary denies that the Government desire to put down legitimate combination. That is the point. I want to know what is a legitimate combination. Is a combination of tenants not to pay rents until they can come to terms with their landlords a conspiracy? That is what we want the Government to tell us. That is what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian have pressed the Government again and again to tell us; but they have not told us and they will not tell us; and that being so, we, having been denied any definition or explanation of what is a criminal conspiracy, it does seem to me that we should be wrong in allowing the Government to introduce words which strengthen the Law of Conspiracy, but do not, in any degree, define that law.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I do not intend to make any lengthened observations on the question before the Committee, but I should like to ask some of the lawyers in the House what change in the effect of the section will be brought about by the introduction of these words? In the early part of the evening the Government opposed two Amendments of mine, on the ground that the words I proposed to add were surplusage; and, that being so, I am not sure that the Amendment that they now move is not open to the same objection. It is only right that those who introduce these words should be able to give some meaning to them—should be able to point out that they make some modification of the section, and should rise in their place for the purpose of doing so at once. I notice that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General did not rise in his place for the purpose of moving the Amendment.

MR. DILLON : I object to this Amendment, because it really is no limitation of the clause. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General know that perfectly well. It is put into this Bill for the same purpose, as the measure is entitled "A Bill for the Amendment of the Criminal Law of Ireland." It is put in in order to throw dust in the eyes of the people of England, and to lead them to believe that what is punished under the Criminal Law of England will be punished under this Act in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has just stated, for the third or fourth time, that the accusations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, when he accused the Government of the intention of using this section against legitimate organizations in Ireland, are entirely unfounded. If that be so, why do not the Government accept limitations that will put it out of their power to use this section against legitimate organizations? We all remember the declaration of the poet—I do not know whether I recollect the words accurately, but I think they were—

"So glorious is the privilege to kill,

All court the power, but none avow the will." The Government want the power to put down our organizations, but they deny that they have the will to do so. Why, I ask, if they have not the will, do they not propose a limitation that will take the power out of their hands? We reserve to ourselves the right to entertain our own opinion as to that. Whatever the intention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary may be, I know perfectly well what his action will be when he gets this Bill passed into law. If I held to my own inclinations I should certainly divide the Committee against this Amendment; but as some of my Colleagues would prefer not to have a Division I shall not persist in the matter.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR : I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, whether the Government are prepared to divide the House on this Amendment? They have not been able to give a single argument in support of it, or to show that it will make the Bill better; and when the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy pointed out that the words "criminal conspiracy" conveyed just as much as the words "criminal conspiracy now punishable by law," the Chief Secretary readily intimated his assent to that proposition. Under these circumstances, where is the justification for the introduction of these words? At any rate, what would be the justification of detaining the Committee during the time which would be necessary for taking a Division in order to get the words introduced, seeing that they are unnecessary, and will not improve or elucidate the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN called on Mr. R. T. REID; and there being no response—

THE CHAIRMAN : Does the hon. and learned Member intend to move his Amendment?

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.) : I did not intend, Sir, to move my Amendment, because I understood that an hon. Member who has put down an exactly similar Amendment intended to move it instead; but if he does not I will move mine. My proposal is in page 2, line 18, to leave out the words "or induce." The object of my Amendment is very simple, and I will state it in two or three words. The grounds upon which I think these words should be omitted are because, if there has been any kind of moral suasion, even good advice, or advice thought to be good, it may be the means of rendering a man liable to punishment for crime. What I take to be an improper operation on the mind of another man is to put pressure on him against his will; but using suasion or argument such as I refer to does not seem to me to be an element of criminal offence. I desire to limit the harshness of this section, and that is the reason why I move to omit these words "or induce."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 18, to leave out the words "or induce."
—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) : I do not see how we can accept this Amendment after the discussion we have already had and the alterations we have introduced into the clause. The clause deals with an agreement to commit an offence under the section, and it would seem necessary to include in the provision any persons who might induce others to become guilty.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I wish to point out very briefly to the Committee the position in which we are. The case of the Government was that a conspiracy meant an agreement which might be either lawful or illegal, and that it was necessary to put the word "criminal" before it in order to show that a criminal association or agreement was meant. Now, conspiracy is a mere act of agreement, and what makes it criminal or lawful is the object of those who conspire. It is the means employed or the act agreed on that makes it lawful or illegal. The clause defines the means, and the object of the so-called conspiracy, the position we are in is this — that an agreement to compel or induce any person or persons not to do so and so is declared by the clause to be criminal. What would be the effect of it if we leave the word "induce" in? Why we shall have a statutory declaration that it is criminal to agree to induce any person to do so and so. That is a most undesirable position. We cannot exclude the question of the objects of an agreement. The objects are defined in the Bill, and the only question which will be left is whether an agreement has been come to or not. To leave out of sight the question as to whether or not the agreement has been come to for specific unlawful objects, and to make it criminal merely to combine to induce any person not to fulfil a lawful obligation, would be introducing an entirely new change into the law.

MR. SHAW LEFFEVRE (Bradford, Central): The word "induce" is governed by the word "criminal," the Attorney General says. If that were so, I should not object to it. It would then mean that the inducement must be by criminal or fraudulent means; but that is not the meaning of the clause. The word "criminal" does not apply to the word "induce," but to the word "conspiracy;" it has no effect on the word "induce." If it were otherwise I should not object, and should not support the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I have tried to find out where this phrase comes from, and I think we shall discover it has been borrowed. This is the precise term found all through the Whiteboy Acts, which go so far as regards this compelling and inducing as to say that it is to be an offence against the law to use "threats, promises, persuasion, or other undue means." So that promises are undue means, and persuasion is an undue means, and now we are to link together persuasion as an undue means with criminal conspiracy to persuade, and you are to get into the clause the whole of the Whiteboy Acts that we are to consider afterwards.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said just now that this Bill was not intended to be used against legitimate combinations on the part of the tenantry or any other class in Ireland. After that declaration I cannot, for the life of me, see any good grounds for the Government's refusal to accept this very moderate Amendment. Sir, the object of the Amendment is to protect people from the operation of this Act who may influence the actions of their friends and neighbours by legitimate advice. The Bill is supposed to be framed to be used against people who practise intimidation and violence to compel others to adopt their views with regard to the holding of land, and with regard to other affairs in Ireland. Well, Sir, by all means, if you wish to apply this Act to check intimidation, and to prevent people from compelling other people by violence from doing that which they consider they have a right to do, you may do it. Do that by all means; but do not bring people under this Bill for merely giving advice to their friends. Now, unless this Amendment is accepted, it will be thought that no two or three people will be at liberty to go to a friend and give advice about the taking of a farm, or the buying of cattle at a fair, without laying themselves open to be branded under this section for conspiracy. Sir, it has been over and over again pointed out that the law with regard to conspiracy is extremely vague, and it has been stated, without contradiction, that almost every agreement arrived at upon any matter by more than two persons might be called a criminal conspiracy. So that if two or three men were to advise a neighbour not to take a particular farm because they thought it would not be to his ultimate advantage, these people, though they might only have given friendly advice, without any illegal intent whatever, merely with a view of helping the man, might be proceeded against for criminal conspiracy. I cannot see on what grounds the Government refuse the Amendment, since it does not hamper the administration of the Bill against persons who may use violence or intimidation to enforce their views; but only provides that men who use legitimate persuasion or advice to induce their friends not to take a certain course of action shall be exempted from the operation of this Bill. I do not think that the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland gave any satisfactory reason to the Committee why this Amendment should not be accepted; and I should like to hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman say why it is that the Government, if they are anxious to prove their sincerity—in stating that they do not wish this Bill to be used against legitimate combinations—will not accept this. Why will they not give us this security, and guarantee that the measure is not to interfere with legitimate combinations of tenantry in Ireland? It is perfectly evident that under this clause, if they do not accept the Amendment, that no one in Ireland will be able to give advice or to use legitimate means of persuasion there on any earthly subject. You will shut the mouths of those who are friendly to the people, and practically give the landlords complete power over their tenantry; you will stand between the tenants and those unjust and unreasonable bargains which the landlords might wish to make them take. I think the Attorney General for Ireland should give us some good reason why the Government will not accept this Amendment to drop out these two words “or induce,” which alteration will by no means interfere with the stringency of the Act against persons who use violence or intimidation, but which will give a guarantee that persons will not be taken up and put in prison for conspiracy when they only gave such advice to their friends as is given every day, not only in Ireland, but in Great Britain also.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): The reason these words are retained by the Government in opposition to our wish is not only that they may enable the Government to lay its hands upon associations or conspiracies that may be criminal, but that it may bring before the summary tribunals words which may be used on public platforms. I maintain that the Government insist upon these words in order that they may connect persons who speak on public platforms with conspiracies—that is to say, that they may charge them with conspiring with the tenants not to pay rent. Assuming that you can connect the National League, we will say, in any part of Ireland, with a movement upon any particular estate to withhold the payment of an excessive rent, you immediately connect with that so-called conspiracy every branch of the League, and take in every meeting that is being held under its auspices. You could make people speaking 200 miles away from the estate upon which the tenants were advised to withhold the payment of excessive rents liable to criminal proceedings under this Act. These words “or induce” will enable the Government to strike at every man who dares to open his mouth on a public platform in Ireland. There is no word that a man could utter on a public platform in Ireland in respect of which this section, framed as it is, will not lay him open to a criminal prosecution, and so long as public men are prevented from using platforms in order to induce people to adopt certain political views, there is an end of freedom of speech in Ireland. If such a law as this could possibly come into operation in England, the most conspicuous of the Tory orators of the day would have exposed themselves to incarceration in the cells of the prisons of this country. It would have been possible to have convicted and imprisoned them under this section. Let us suppose that two ordinary cattle dealers are looking over, criticizing, and estimating the value of a lot of cattle. Suppose a third person comes up and asks them their opinion of the cattle, as he thinks of buying them; if they say “These cattle are not very good, and you ought not to buy them,” this man may communicate that to the landlord or his agent, or the agent may overhear it, an information may be sworn to the effect that these two cattle dealers conspired to prevent the sale of the landlord's cattle, and there will be at once a preliminary inquiry and a prosecution before two Resident Magistrates. In that way really harmless words spoken at a fair between ordinary friends, and with no criminal intent whatever, may lead to the punishment of perfectly honest people. We know that the value of the word "criminal" before "conspiracy" is absolutely nil. It means absolutely nothing, and its omission would leave the clause exactly as it is. That has been maintained to-night from the Government Bench, and maintained with truth. The words "criminal conspiracy" will be no protection, for the criminality will not be criminality in the view of Judges of England or Ireland, but simply in the opinion of the Irish Resident Magistrates.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): If you take these words "or induce" in connection with the words which follow, such as "not to fulfil his or their legal obligations," or "not to let, hire, use, or occupy any land, or not to deal with, work for, or hire any person or persons," it will give the Government the power of indicting a person for the most petty offence under the name of "criminal conspiracy." Not only will the Government be able to indict people for anything, no matter how petty, but the Irish Attorney General has pointed out that the whole machinery of this Act may be put in force by any person. I do not say that the Government will necessarily draw the line where the Act may be put in operation in the wrong place; but I do not like giving over to the Government, and to any person in the whole of Ireland, the power of drawing the line at any offence. To say that every person shall have the power of saying that every trivial act a man may do is a criminal offence is a reductio ad absurdum. I do not suppose that the Government would punish these things as a criminal conspiracy; but, supposing that two or three persons should combine to leave their pigs on the road, that, no doubt, would be very wrong; but the offenders should hardly be indicted for a criminal conspiracy in respect of it, and yet, under this Act, if one "induces" others to do such a thing, anyone may indict them, and have them punished for a criminal conspiracy. But take another case which is often attended with a certain amount of violence—a case which is very well known in England—where a number of persons lay claim to a right of way. A man may wish to maintain a right of way, or the owner of land may wish to close a right of way, and a person may "induce" others to assist him in attaining his object. If the Government choose, or the person supposed to be in possession of the right of way cares to exercise the power, they or he can have those persons indicted for criminal conspiracy. Such an offence, however, ought not to be punished by imprisonment, or as a criminal proceeding; but where the case is established a fine of £10, £20, or £30 ought to be inflicted. Then I would take another case—the case of the Guardians of a Poor Law Union. I myself have often "induced" other Guardians to put certain machinery in motion; that machinery may be legal or illegal, for it is often extremely difficult to know what is really the law which governs Poor Law Unions, and what are really the duties of Guardians—I go further, and say that in Ireland it is very often extremely difficult for Guardians of the Poor to comply with the law and their legal obligations. Well, if we do not comply with the law and our legal obligations we are subject to certain punishments, either as a union, or in our individual capacities; but I do not think we ought to be indicted for criminal conspiracy even if we fail to comply with our legal obligations, and yet, if this Bill passes in its present shape, we should be constantly liable to such indictment. Politically speaking, in my own case, I am afraid it would be perfectly impossible for me to make a single speech to my constituents without laying myself open to indictment for criminal conspiracy. Even if I told the electors not to vote for the Conservative candidate I should be brought, in some way, under this Bill. I quite admit that the whole case is very different so far as the word "compel" is concerned. If you "compel" a person to do any of the things mentioned in this section—that is to say—

"Not to fulfil his or their legal obligations, or not to let, hire, use, or occupy any land, or not to deal with, work for, or hire any person or persons in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation," there is a strong prima facie reason that you are liable to punishment; but merely for "inducing" a combination amongst individuals for a certain purpose, unless the combination is itself criminal, not even the tremendous powers of this Act should be put in force. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member who is now sitting amongst the Conservative ranks would allow me to explain, I would point out that the chief objection I have to the proposal of the Government is that it leaves it to almost every policeman to draw the line; it enables them to draw the line at an offence infinitesimally small, and to indict us for the most ordinary acts. If this section becomes law as it is framed, it will enable a policeman to indict a person for an offence of such a small and ordinary character that it would be better punished by a fine of 5s. and the infliction of costs than by putting the powers of this Act into force.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): We are, to my mind, at the turning point of the whole matter. It is argued in this House that the present political situation in Ireland, and the representation of the country in this House, has been produced by intimidation. Well, we challenge the Government, and those who make this assertion, to make good their words, and to stand, in this clause, by the words "compel" or "terrorize." But they insist upon the word "induce." What will be the result of adopting this word? Why, I hold in my hand a Petition, which I have been asked to present to this House, from an elected body of Guardians, trying to "induce" Her Majesty's Government to improve the Land Act, and to have a general re-valuation, so as to bring about a reduction of rates. It seems to me that that is trying to "induce" Her Majesty's Government not to do an act which they have a legal right to do. Am I to be told that because a newspaper writer tells the people of Ireland how best to combine in order to secure for themselves a just and fair rent, that because he writes what he thinks in the open light of day, and is prepared to take the consequences of his action, he is to be prosecuted for criminal conspiracy? Why, if this clause is carried, there is not a single speech that can be made, there is not a single expression that can be used, on the part of the tenants in Ireland, which may not bring the person who utters it under an indictment for a criminal conspiracy. [Laughter.] I tell the Government, whether they laugh at us or not—I tell them plainly and flatly that, whatever meaning they attach to this word "induce," so long as the present state of things is maintained in Ireland, so long as we see exorbitant rents extracted from the pockets of the miserable tenantry, and the roof-trees burned over the heads of people who cannot pay their rents, so long shall we stand up and speak and use every effort to induce these people to combine against the payment of unfair rents. And what I say here I will say elsewhere, where it will be more useful to say it than here, and where I shall get a more sympathetic audience. My words will not be an incentive to violence—they never have been. I challenge anyone to point to a single word of mine, written or spoken, which has incited to violence, or has been calculated to incite to violence. I shall use every endeavour to get the people to combine against rack-renting and oppression, and I sincerely hope I shall be the means of inducing them to combine. I say that in absolute defiance of what the Government may do. But there may be many people less physically capable than myself of facing the consequences of such a course. We challenge the Government upon their own declaration, which was that their Bill was directed against terrorism. Why do they not direct it against terrorism? ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. and gallant Gentleman who cheers that observation does not seem to appreciate the point we are now on. Surely it is too much to say in the case of a man with the instincts of humanity in his breast that he should abstain from advising people to resist tyranny, and that if he does so and is successful you punish him. Do you declare that any man who should advise his fellow-countrymen in this way shall be brought up under this clause? There would be some sense in that, but the word you use is "induce." It appears, then, that if a man advises another to resist tyranny he is not to be prosecuted at all; but if a man induces another to resist it he is to be sent to gaol. That is an old policy which is not calculated to soothe, but to sow strife among all classes of people. You will allow advice to be given to the tenants; but if men, in the earnestness of truth, stand up for a certain class in Ireland, and induce them to combine, then Her Majesty's Government are very ready to prosecute. I will show why the Purchase Bill of the Government itself should come under the operation of this clause. At the present time a tenant in Ireland agrees at the point of the bayonet to purchase his land at a certain exorbitant price. I give an instance where the landlord has asked his tenants to agree to purchase all their holdings at an exorbitant figure; the landlord evicts these people, because they do not agree to his proposal. I know an instance where a Sheriff has gone to a tenant with a writ of ejection in the one hand and a written agreement to purchase the land in the other. It is said you have a legal right to make these agreements; but we interpose and say we will not allow the purchase to take place. I myself know an instance in which land has been bought at 18 or 20 years' purchase which the Land Commissioners would not ratify, because the land was not worth the price. Therefore, I say that the Land Commission, in refusing to allow the land to be purchased in that way, would come under the operation of the clause. Suppose that we, having the interest of our people as much at heart as ever you have had it, go amongst the tenants and advise them to stand together and consult among themselves as to what is reasonable. I ask is it because we induce them to do this that we are to be made the victims of this enactment? I do not, of course, expect to induce any hon. Members below the Gangway opposite to do anything of the kind. I would as soon go into a cabbage garden and expect the cabbages to listen to me. I say if the Government would consider for a moment that we have at heart the interest of the country in which we were born, and which we represent in this House, and if they would in some way shape their Act in the direction which we indicate, it is quite possible that we should stand off and give it a fair trial to see whether it would be of any use for the purpose of putting down criminality in Ireland. But if I find that this is to be an Act to perpetrate injustice in Ireland I shall ever speak of the Act as it appears to me—[Interruption—and as little as I care for the interruptions of hon. Members opposite so little shall I hesitate to state my view of the case in Ireland. You have put us in a position in which we are forced to be opponents of every word and line of the measure in this House, and we shall not hesitate to take up the same position in regard to it when the time comes, if it ever does come, for its application in Ireland.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I think we might now go to a Division on this subject. I am sorry that the Government have not accepted the Amendment, because the contrast between the word sought to be introduced and that which is in the Bill is so clear that there can be no misunderstanding about the matter. The Government, by their action, show that the clause is distinctly to be used against innocent combination. If there was ever any doubt about that these words make it perfectly clear. The introduction of the word "induce" makes it evident that the object of the clause is that every combination shall be attacked, though it may be a combination entirely devoid of any criminal intention. In taking this Division—[Laughter, and cries of "Divide!"—I cannot but admire the manners of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I am doing what I can to facilitate the conclusion of this discussion, and I am endeavouring in the briefest terms to indicate the true character of this clause before we take a Division upon the Amendment; and, having done so, I think the sooner we take the Division the better.

MR. W. REDMOND: I wish to draw attention to the fact that throughout the discussion on this Amendment Irish Members have been most persistently interrupted by hon. Members opposite. I would submit very respectfully that, to say the least of it, it is not decent, when Irish Members are endeavouring to do what, in their opinion, is their duty to their constituents, that they should be interrupted thus by hon. Members opposite who are opposed to their views; and I appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, to ask hon. Members who have no interest in the details of this discussion, and who desire to engage in conversation, to leave the House and allow us to proceed with that which to us is a matter of the greatest moment.

Mr. Edward Harrington

THE CHAIRMAN: I regret that there should be any ground for complaint, but I am forced to confess that there is.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 265; Noes 180; Majority 85.—(Div. List, No. 162.)

Amendment negatived.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): The Amendment which I am about to move is one which the Government can use for strengthening the Land Bill, when it comes into operation in Ireland. Suppose when large numbers of the tenants avail themselves of the Land Bill, they find that their action brings them within this clause. I ask how they are in that case to get the benefit of the Land Bill? Surely, to give the Resident Magistrates power to say whether they shall do so or not is pushing the matter to absurdity. Whether you appeal to a man's fears or passions, whether you use force or terror, or whether you use reason, you have no right to tell him you repudiate his liability. Unquestionably, it will many a time be the duty of a man towards his family, or towards the State or local government, to insist upon withholding certain payments. It will be a tremendous thing if men are not left to the ordinary freedom of a country to combine to determine in what priority they shall discharge their legal obligations. There are some Amendments which, I believe, will not be moved. [Ministerial cries of "Hear, hear!"] I trust that on that account hon. Gentlemen opposite will be all the more inclined to accept my Amendment. There are some Amendments upon the Paper which plainly show in what way even a landlord, by compelling men to fulfil their legal obligations to him, would thereby take from the men the means of fulfilling their other obligations. I deny that in Ireland rent is so sacred an obligation, and one of such supreme importance that it should be paid before any other debt. I beg to propose the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 18, to leave out the words "not to fulfil," in order to insert the words "to repudiate."—(Mr. O'Doherty.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'not to fulfil' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I presume that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. O'Doherty) means, by the insertion of the word "repudiate," that there should be some action done by the tenant to inform his creditor, whoever he may be, that he repudiates the matter altogether. I certainly cannot consent to that, and I think, having regard to what the Committee has already done, it must be admitted that for persons to conspire together to induce a person to repudiate his obligations is an offence, and it must be admitted that it is equally an offence if they compel or induce a person to keep his money in his pocket, and not to fulfil his obligations.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I think my hon. Friend (Mr. O'Doherty) explained with sufficient clearness what the distinction was. Repudiation would be a total denial of an obligation, but it could not be said that a tenant repudiated his obligation to his landlord if he offered his rent at a 20 per cent reduction. That is the distinction, I think, which my hon. Friend made, and which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has not made. Now, Mr. Courtney, let me put a particular case. Five years ago this Parliament passed an Act, which was called the Arrears Act. By virtue of that Act tenants in Ireland were enabled to apply to the Land Commission, and the Land Commission was authorized, in certain cases, to remit a portion of the arrears due by tenants. Now, you can imagine that Act being in force at the time this Bill became law. It would be actually a criminal offence if any Member sitting in this quarter of the House or if any public man in Ireland went among the tenants for whose benefit the Arrears Act was passed, and advised them to take advantage of the provisions of the Act, and go to the Land Commission and ask for a reduction of their rents. The Arrears Act lapsed some years ago, and my hon. Friend (Mr. O'Doherty) pointed out very properly that the Government have themselves in contemplation, and have introduced in "another place," a measure which is intended to enable tenants in Ireland, in certain cases, to retain a remission of their rents, and which will enable those tenants to discharge their obligations as regards their arrears of rent by the payment of a portion of the sums due from them, and that if this Bill passed in its present shape any Member of Parliament or any public man who goes among the Irish tenantry, and takes it upon himself to recommend them to take advantage of the provisions of that other Bill which the Government profess themselves anxious to pass, will make himself liable to the provisions of this clause, and subject himself to the penalties provided. That Bill provides—I do not want to discuss it, but I may refer to one of its provisions by way of illustration—that Bill provides that, in certain cases, the tenants can go into the County Court and say that they are unable to pay their arrears of rent, that the rent is exorbitant, and that they should be released from their obligation to pay the rent in full, on offering or tendering a certain portion of it. Now, Mr. Courtney, if this Bill passes, it appears to me that to recommend the tenants to take advantage of that provision would be a criminal offence. What does this Bill provide? It provides that any person who shall take part in any criminal conspiracy—and it is now agreed that the word “conspiracy” means nothing more in the opinion of the Government than an agreement—any person, therefore, who shall take part in any agreement to induce any person or persons not to fulfil his or their legal obligations shall be subjected to the penalties of this Act. Because a man recommends the tenants to go into Court and obtain the benefits of the Government Bill, he recommends those tenants not to fulfil their legal obligations. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland may say this case is governed by the word “criminal;” but the word “criminal,” we have it over and over again—and we have it from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. A. J. Balfour)—would not govern a case of this kind, because acts done by an individual, innocent in themselves, became criminal if done by a number of persons. Consequently “criminal” does not help us in the least. It amounts to this—that if a number of persons agree to induce tenants to take advantage of the Bill which the Government are passing in “another place,” they will be liable to be hauled before two Resident Magistrates, and to be imprisoned for six months. The distinction given by my hon. Friend is perfectly plain. If you accept his Amendment, the clause of the Government will not apply to a case of that kind, because the tenants who acted on the advice given to them, although they would not be fulfilling their obligations, they would not be repudiating them. Let us remember, in this connection, the famous dictum of Lord Fitzgerald, in the case of “the Queen v. Parnell.” In that case Lord Fitzgerald laid it down that a landlord’s right was to his full rent and not to a part of it; and anybody, or any body of persons, who recommended or advised tenants not to fulfil their legal obligations to pay landlords their full rent, were guilty of taking part in a criminal conspiracy, and could be punished for it. Now, that is the point my hon. Friend raised. If you use in this section the words “not to fulfil” you will place on the tenant the obligation of paying their rent to the very last penny; if, on the other hand, you accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and substitute for the words “not to fulfil” the word “repudiate” you will enable the tenants to make the best terms they can, and either to induce the landlords to give them a reduction, or to take advantage of the Bill the Government are passing in “another place,” and which, we are told, is intended to confer a great many benefits on the Irish tenants.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Mr. Courtney, judging from past experience, there can be no question that we shall be accused of engaging in criminal conspiracy. It must be remembered that that distinguished statesman (Mr. John Bright)—I speak of him in his general capacity, not as a Member of Parliament—always refers to the Irish Party as a rebel conspiracy. [MR. JOHNSTON: Hear, hear!] Fortunately the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) is not a Resident Magistrate. We are always referred to as a rebel conspiracy, or as a conspiracy to induce the tenants of Ireland to do certain unlawful things. This Bill is brought in, and the question at issue is a question of rent pure and simple. Now, our contention has been that the rents of Ireland are too high; we say to the tenants of Ireland that Lord Cowper's Commission recommends you a reduction of 18 per cent, and, under these circumstances, you are entitled to a reduction which English landlords are giving to their tenants. We are met by this Bill, in which it goes without saying that we shall be considered a criminal conspiracy. Eighty-five Members of the House of Commons have been described by Mr. Bright—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. T. M. HEALY: I only speak of him in his general capacity.

THE CHAIRMAN: The distinction the hon. and learned Gentleman dwells upon is not real. The fact that a present Member of the House makes a speech out of the House is not sufficient to entitle the hon. and learned Gentleman to speak of him by name. It is only in referring to the past, that names of Gentlemen are used in the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I heard Mr. William O'Brien referred to to-night by name without protest. Anyhow, Mr. Courtney, the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) always refers to this Party as a criminal conspiracy. Now, if we recommend the tenants in consequence of the state of the crops, or the state of trade, or anything else to insist upon reductions which English landlords give their tenants, we shall of course, in the judgment of hon. Gentlemen opposite, be sharers in a criminal conspiracy, and Resident Magistrates in their pay and at their back will at once find us guilty of criminal conspiracy. We have said, and I trust we shall continue to say, to the tenants of Ireland, if you are unable by reason of the season to pay your rents without defrauding your other creditors, you must not do so. We contend that in equity the tenants have more claim to their rents than the landlords, and therefore we advise tenants to pay the shopkeepers with whom they deal, before they pay the landlord. That will be considered an incitement under this Act to people to engage in a criminal conspiracy not to pay a particular person, whereas it is nothing of the kind. I submit it is giving a preference to no particular creditor, but treating all men on the same scale. We have never advised the tenants to repudiate their obligations, and therefore, we claim the protection that the word "repudiate" will give. I think it is only a reasonable thing that the Government should accept this Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 259; Noes 137: Majority 122.—(Div. List, No. 163.)

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to move, Sir, that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. I have to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury to assent to this Motion, in order that we may go on with Report of Supply and consider several important questions that arise therein.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I understand there are several Amendments on the Paper that will not be pressed, and some that will not be moved, and under the circumstances, I think it would be better that we should run through these and go on with the Committee until we come to some substantive Amendment upon which there is opposition.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The right hon. Gentleman should remember that some hon. Members have been waiting here all night in order to bring questions forward on Report of Supply. It is intended, I believe, to raise a discussion in reference to the Scotch Crofters Act, and seeing that private Members, owing to the action of the Government in taking the whole of the time of the House for the Coercion Bill, have been unable to bring matters under the notice of the House on private Members' days, I think the least the Government can do is to allow us some time on Report of Supply to take such discussions. We on these Benches desire to raise attention to the question of the suppression of meetings in Ireland, and we shall certainly do it at some hour of the night or morning. As we are to have an Autumn Session the Government have plenty of time on their hands, and I do think, therefore, it would only be reasonable on their part to let Progress be reported. If you will appoint 6 o'clock to-morrow for the meeting of the House, it will be reasonable, perhaps, to go on with the Committee; but it certainly is not reasonable to expect us to sit here all night discussing Amendments, and then to proceed to consider questions on Report of Supply afterwards, and to come here at the ordinary time this evening. At this hour (1.5 a.m.), it is only reasonable that Progress should be reported.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. and learned Gentleman must have misunderstood me. I said it was understood that a number of the Amendments next on the Paper will not be moved, or if moved, will not be pressed, and that under the circumstances I thought it would be better to proceed with those Amendments.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): If the hon. Gentleman (Dr. Clark) withdraws his Motion, it will be competent to make a similar Motion at any time.

DR. CLARK: I withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I have been asked by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Hull (Mr. King) to move the Amendment standing in his name—that is to say, in page 2, line 19, after “or,” to insert “to compel any person or persons, by means of threats, intimidation, or violence.” Since this is a very substantial Amendment, and as it comes from the Tory part of the House, I think it should be properly discussed. I would, therefore, ask that Progress should be reported.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 19, after “or,” insert “to compel any person or persons, by means of threats, intimidation, or violence.” — (Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. W. H. SMITH: I beg to move that you, Sir, do now report Progress.

Motion made and Question, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,”—(Mr. W. H. Smith),—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [17th May], “That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution.”

Mr. T. M. Healy

2. “That a further sum, not exceeding £3,830,300, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge for the following Civil Services and Revenue Departments for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1888.”

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) rose to speak, when—

MR. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. Member that he has already spoken in the debate, and is precluded from taking further part in the discussion before the House.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I wish to ask Her Majesty's Government for some information as to when they intend to fill the vacancy at present existing in the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland. I presume I am in Order in going into this matter under the Vote for the Irish Law Courts. It is about six weeks since the Government succeeded in passing a measure which was considered so urgent that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary got up in this House and said it was necessary to pass it without discussion or debate. On that representation, Sir, several blocks which stood against the Bill were withdrawn, and the Government succeeded in passing the measure through this House post-haste, and through “another place,” and it is now the law of the land. Seeing that the Bill passed through both Chambers six weeks ago, it is rather surprising that the Government have not availed themselves of the opportunity which the provisions of that Bill offers for filling up the vacancy I have referred to. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary declared, when the Bill was under discussion, that it was quite impossible that the Common Pleas Division could continue to discharge its functions unless this appointment was made; but, in the face of that fact, we have seen six weeks elapse, and yet have heard no hint even of the likelihood of the appointment being made. I would press the Government to give us some information on this subject. I do not think they have treated us fairly. They first induced us to take our blocks off the measure, by representing that the matter was of the utmost urgency, and now that they have had the Bill six weeks, they make not the smallest use of it. I ask them if they will give us some information as to what they mean to do? The Chief Secretary is, as usual, not present; but I would express a hope that some other official representing the Government would be able to give us some information on this point.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The hon. Gentleman seems excessively anxious to know what is going to be done under a Bill which has not yet received the Royal Assent, and which, therefore, is not yet law.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Six weeks ago I was refused by the Government a single night's discussion of this Bill, on their assurance that it made all the difference of a cataclysm of a Parliamentary character in the ordinary conduct of debate whether the Bill was taken on a Thursday or a Friday. The Government could not wait for the Bill one day; they were in a terrible hurry; the people of Ireland were gasping for the appointment of a new Judge. The measure has passed the House of Lords, and there would have been no difficulty in getting the Royal Assent to it; indeed, since the Bill passed both Houses we have several times seen Black Rod walk up to this Table. The anxiety of the Government to appoint a new Judge is so slight that, notwithstanding the extraordinary pressure they put upon us to pass the Bill, now that they have got it they have not taken the smallest trouble to get the Royal Assent to it. I quite appreciate the object of the delay on the part of the Government, and I must say it is a high compliment you pay to the Law Officer who has been extremely vilified by The Times. You have not given the Bill the Royal Assent, in order that, for the present, you may not lose the services of the Attorney General for Ireland. If at first you had said frankly what you meant to do, the position would have been a reasonable one to take up; but the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary told us that the Bill was so necessary that you could not wait a single day for it, and we had it on his assurance that some very frightful thing would happen if the Bill did not pass at once. "Unless you pass this Bill," he said, "we shall be obliged to fill up the Chief Justiceship of the Common Pleas." Such pressure did the Government put on the House that the third reading of the measure was allowed to be taken on the same night that the Committee stage was disposed of. The Bill went up to the House of Lords at once, and it passed there ever so long ago. The Government have been keeping it up their sleeve, so to speak, ever since. This shows their precious way of doing business. They find their Irish Attorney General so extremely useful here that they cannot allow him to be made a Judge. I only hope that when they can spare him, and when he retires to the Bench, he will be found as useful a Judge as he has been an Attorney General. But it was not my intention in rising to discuss that subject; I desired to call attention to a different matter altogether. I rise to refer to the action of Her Majesty's Government in reference to the Ulster meeting. Things in Ireland have been brought to this pass—that when a certain class of people determine to hold a public meeting, and a placard is issued by someone announcing a counter meeting, then the first meeting is not to be held. I would ask Members of the Orange Party whether that is reasonable? I put it to the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) whether, when the Orange Party hold their meetings in Dublin, at the Rotunda, in splendid style, with all their regalia, they are never interfered with at all? We do not dream of interfering with them—in fact, they rather amuse us. They build their Orange Hall in Dublin next to the Palace of the Catholic Archbishop, and no one objects to their mummery. We consider them harmless, and their meetings never give rise to anything in the slightest degree in the nature of a panic. But what is the last act of the Government in regard to freedom of public meeting in Ireland? [An hon. MEMBER: Speak up!] An hon. Member says "Speak up!" I always use my natural voice in speaking, and I have always succeeded in making myself heard. I think if hon. Gentlemen opposite would stop their conversation, no one would have any difficulty in hearing me. Her Majesty's Government, when it suits their purpose, are fond of appealing to the example of Lord Spencer. They refer to his course of action as a precedent. Well, in Lord Spencer's time, there was a meeting held in Dungannon in no degree differing from that which is now proclaimed. I travelled down to it with the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland (Colonel King-Harman). We sat in the same train, and in the same carriage, and the only thing he said disrespectful to me was that I smoked cigars as long as his arm. Seeing that I do not smoke at all, I think that was rather hard. He also said he was sorry Her Majesty's Government had lent me their protection to prevent the Orangemen breaking my head. Well, what happened on the occasion of that meeting? Why, what happened shows how completely the peace can be preserved in Dungannon. I went into the gathering with nothing but a stick in my hand, and the Rev. Roaring Kane shouted out — "There is So-and-so; show him how you can cheer for the Queen;" and they showed me how they could cheer for the Queen by raising their shillelaghs in the air, and directing them at my head. There was a troop of dragoons present, fortunately, so that notwithstanding the excitement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, and of the Rev. Roaring Kane, nothing serious took place. The Under Secretary declared, on that occasion, that he was extremely sorry that the "protection," as he called it, of the Queen's troops had been given to me—in other words, he was extremely sorry that I had not been killed by his Orange friends. But I did not feel in the least aggrieved by the expressions of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. He is a military man, and we must take these things from him with certain qualifications. But what I want to point out is, that at a meeting at Dungannon similar to that which has been proclaimed, Lord Spencer was able to keep the peace, notwithstanding the incitement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman and others like him. This incitement went on to an enormous extent at that time, and yet without breaking the peace. A lot of Tories came over to Ireland especially, and addressed a meeting of the Orange Party in the Rotunda—a meeting presided over by the Orange Grand Master. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury was there, and he heard the incitements addressed to the Orangemen of Ulster to break up our meetings and break our heads. He sat and listened to his present Attorney General for Ireland, when he declared that the blood of Giffen was on the head of Lord Spencer; he heard the Under Secretary for Ireland tell the people to keep the cartridge in the rifle, and use other expressions of the same kind. And yet, notwithstanding these meetings of Orangemen, and notwithstanding the death of a man which occurred through the riotous proceedings of the mob, who broke the windows of the convent in which the Lady lay sick—a circumstance which was so inconvenient to the Tory Party at the time, that Sir Stafford Northcote had to write a letter regretting its occurrence—Earl Spencer was able to keep order in Ulster. The noble Earl could allow meetings to take place and yet keep order, and that notwithstanding the Orange Party were led on by Sir Stafford Northcote, by the First Lord of the Treasury, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. [Cries of "Divide!"] Perhaps the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite who cries "Divide!"—[An hon. MEMBER: Not gallant.] Then I will say nothing about him. Though these incitements were addressed to the Orange Party by Gentlemen so distinguished, and though the Orange Party were roused to fury by those incitements, and by the fact that the Franchise Act was being passed by Her Majesty's Government—for they knew it would give us a majority of the Ulster Representation—notwithstanding all that, I say, Lord Spencer preserved the peace so thoroughly that, with the sole exception of the lad Giffen, who was brought 100 miles, and paid 2s. 6d., in order to attend a meeting in a county and a district he did not belong to, no one suffered injury. That was the state of things under Lord Spencer; but what is the state of things now? A Protestant Association, called The Protestant Home Rule Association, which has no connection with the National League, a modest, hum-drum Association, not in any way associated with "conspirators" like ourselves—an Association led by Mr. Shillington, Mr. Thomas Dixon, and other gentlemen who are Northern Presbyterians, in a quiet, family manner, amongst kith and kin and fellow-Presbyterians, propose to hold a meeting to protest against the policy of the Government. Now, I must say that whatever we have had to say about Lord Spencer, we never complained that he did not allow us to talk against his policy. But now, when a body of men threaten to hold counter demonstrations, Her Majesty's Government say that we shall not hold our meetings, because the Orange Party will not keep the peace. This is exactly the case of the Salvation Army and the Skeleton Army riots, which were the subject of a decision in the Courts of Law. The Skeleton Army said that the Salvationists should not be allowed to parade in one of your English towns. [Interruption.] I would advise the hon. Member opposite to take some soda water.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. and learned Gentleman is not here to keep order. That is my duty.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I quite recognize that that is your duty, Mr. Speaker, and I regret that I was betrayed into making the remark I did by the disorder on the other side of the House. The Government must, I think, recognize that the case with which we are dealing is governed by the law as it was laid down in the case of the Sittingbourne riots, when the Skeleton Army endeavoured to break up a meeting or procession of the Salvation Army. The Skeleton Army said that they would not allow a procession of the Salvation Army to take place. A sworn information that a breach of the peace was likely to take place was then laid before the magistrates by some of the people of the town, and the magistrates proclaimed the meetings of both the Skeleton and the Salvation Armies. The Salvationists, however, persisted in holding their meeting, in spite of the proclamation of the magistrates, and the case was then taken to the Court of Queen's Bench, which decided that they had a right to do so. That Court said, that if a man were walking peacefully down Oxford Street, and another man said that he would not allow him to do so, that would not entitle the magistrates, or the Government, to say that they would not allow either of them to walk down Oxford Street. Now that is exactly the case of the disturbances in Ulster. The Protestant Home Rulers said—"We will hold meetings, and will protest against the policy of the Government." Thereupon, the Orange Party threaten a counter demonstration, and the Government say—"We will not allow either meeting." Now I contend that the Government are not entitled to take that course, but that they are bound to give protection to lawful meetings. They are, in point of law, as much bound to do that as they are bound to protect a process-server. They are bound to protect every man in the exercise of his lawful rights, whether he is a process-server or not. The Protestant Home Rulers of Ulster have as much right to have their rights regarded and protected in the North of Ireland as the landlords and these process-servers have in the South of Ireland. If the Government say that they cannot allow the Home Rule meetings in Ulster, because they will lead to disorder, then they are bound to put down process-serving and evictions in the South, because those things lead to disorder. But the fact that they do so does not prevent evictions taking place; and then, as to them, the Government say that they will protect every man in the exercise of his legal rights; and so evictions are not only allowed to be carried out, but are protected. I think that in regard to this matter, the Government might learn a lesson from what has just happened in Canada. In spite of threatened turbulence, the Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) has been allowed to hold meetings in Canada, though the Governor General was keenly opposed to him. A meeting was even allowed to be held in Toronto, although there the majority of the inhabitants were said to be adverse to the views of the hon. Member. Yet in Ireland, where you have 35,000 troops, and an unlimited force of all kinds, you say you will not allow these meetings. [A cry of "Divide!" and "Order!"] I appeal, Sir, for your protection against these disorderly interruptions from the other side of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The interruptions of the hon. and learned Gentleman are most un-Parliamentary. A single cry of "Order" or "Divide" is not disorderly. The hon. and learned Gentleman himself gives rise to these interruptions.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I was not aware that there was only a single cry of "Order." I thought there were several cries of "Divide." If I am out of Order, it is for you, and not for Gentlemen opposite to call me to Order. I say, and I repeat it, that in Ireland we have as much right to hold these meetings—and every man and every Party have the same right to hold them—as the landlords have to carry out their evictions. These rights depend on the common law of the country, and the Government have no right to prevent their exercise. Let me tell the Government what will come to pass if these meetings are disallowed. If one set of people, holding a particular political opinion, are allowed to say that people of another political opinion shall not hold their meetings, you will go from politics to religion. And what will happen if the people in the South of Ireland say to the Protestants in that part of the country—"We will make a protest against your celebrations. We will get up such a manifestation of force as will threaten a breach of the peace, and we will then appeal to the Government to put a stop to both demonstrations." Such a thing would strike at the root of civil government in the country. The Orangemen of Dublin now meet in peace and order, and no one endeavours to interfere with them. Under existing circumstances, you can meet indoors or out-of-doors, as you please. An Orange meeting was called only the other day, and, although it was countermanded, that was no fault of ours; if it had been held in public, it would not have been interfered with. I call on the Government to make a distinct declaration of their intentions in this matter. If they intend to suppress meetings simply because other people get up counter demonstrations, all I can say is that these counter demonstrations will then be justified by all people who consider the first meetings obnoxious to their opinions. The Government is taking a course absolutely fatal to public peace and public liberty, when they say they will protect the landlords in the exercise of their rights, but will not protect other people in the exercise of their rights. We say that our civil rights are at least equal to, if they are not paramount, to those of the other class; and we call on the Government to say that they will protect the right of public meeting, although they might have, as Sir George Trevelyan said the other day, that he had to get a small army on one occasion of 1,000 men to do it. Otherwise you will justify the assertion that your Government is a Government in the interests of the Orange organization; and if the Orange organization is allowed to say that they will put down all meetings obnoxious to them, or will prevent them being held, then it is clear that that organization will become the de facto Government of the country.

Mr. T. M. Healy

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The hon. and learned Member has praised Lord Spencer for the course he took in regard to public meetings; but Lord Spencer never countenanced the doctrine that he has laid down to-night. The hon. and learned Member has laid down the doctrine that it is the duty of the Executive to allow any meeting or any number of meetings, notwithstanding—

MR. T. M. HEALY: No; I said that the Government are bound to allow the original meeting to be held.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He may have drawn that conclusion; but the proposition from which he drew it was very much wider, because he said that it was at Common Law the right of everyone to hold a meeting when and where he wished. Then, in that case, it is the right of the Orangemen to hold their meeting at the same time and place as the Home Rule meeting. I contest the whole proposition; but at present I only wish to point out that, if the proposition be true, neither Lord Spencer's theory nor his practice bore it out. The hon. and learned Gentleman has said, that whatever he and his Friends had to complain of Lord Spencer, they never complained that he interfered with liberty of speech. But Lord Spencer proclaimed no fewer than nine Nationalist demonstrations on the ground that Orange demonstrations were about to be held at the same place and at the same time. Then the hon. and Member alluded to the meeting which was not suppressed by Lord Spencer at Dungannon. He said that the circumstances were the same as they are to-day; and therefore we should not have proclaimed the meeting to-day. I do not recollect all the circumstances of the meeting at Dungannon in 1884; but the circumstances of the meeting to-day, as reported to me, were certainly not precisely similar. For I understand that the day fixed for the meeting was also a Roman Catholic holiday, a market day, and a hiring day—all circumstances which would naturally create a situation unfavourable to keeping of the peace. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that there was a Common Law right to hold meetings, and he asked me to give a pledge that the Government would protect the exercise of that right. It is, however, impossible for me, by any pledge given in this House, to place any restriction on the Government beyond that which Lord Spencer was willing to place on himself. As to that, I will read a short sentence from a letter which Lord Spencer caused to be written in 1884. In that letter it was said—

“His Excellency cannot allow any interference with the discretion he reserves to himself, of deciding whether a meeting shall, or shall not, be allowed to take place.”

I repeat this declaration of Lord Spencer on the part of the Government. But I will, at the same time, say that the Government will not allow—it is not their intention to allow—bogus meetings to be called for the sole purpose of interfering with meetings that are otherwise legal. I will only further remind the House that neither this Government, nor any Government, ever proposed to interfere with indoor meetings on behalf of any opinions. It is free to everyone to hold meetings anywhere and everywhere under cover. But there are circumstances, and there are times and occasions, when a meeting held in the open air is a direct provocation to a breach of the peace. The local magistrates are bound, under the Common Law to prevent that, and the Government will certainly back them up.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): May I call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that at the time Lord Spencer proclaimed the Nationalist meetings to which he has referred, he had a Statute which gave him power to limit the Common Law right of meeting. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the magistrates have a right to prevent these meetings; but he did not tell the House under what conditions that discretion can be exercised. I say that the right to disperse a meeting only arises when there has been illegality or an actual breach of the peace. It has been laid down in the most distinct manner by the Courts of this country, that there is no right to prevent a meeting on the score of apprehension. If there is illegality—if the notice convening the meeting declares it to be for advocating something illegal—there may be a right to prohibit that meeting. But if the meeting is called for a prima facie legal object, I say there is no discretion on the part of the magistrates to disperse this meeting unless there is actual illegality committed, or there is a breach of the peace. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has called to his assistance the Common Law of England which he has—I am sure unconsciously—stated in the most imperfect manner.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (MR. T. D. SULLIVAN) (Dublin, College Green): Lord Spencer, I may remind the House, took different courses when meetings were called in the North of Ireland. At first he proclaimed Nationalist demonstrations on the ground that they were illegal, and led to a breach of the peace. Subsequently, he took the course of protecting both Nationalist and Orange demonstrations. In order to do that, he found it necessary on some occasions to send a small army to the scene of operations. On one occasion on which I was present, an Orangeman named Giffen was resisting the efforts of the military to preserve the peace, and while doing so, he received the wound from the effects of which he afterwards died. Nevertheless his death was stigmatized more than once by the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland as an act of foul and deliberate murder by Her Majesty's troops. Again and again, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman has stigmatized that act in those terms. Subsequently, Lord Spencer came to a wiser determination, and adopted a much better course. That was to declare, that whichever meeting was called first in any locality, he would allow that meeting to be held, and would not allow a counter demonstration at the same place on the same day. I have not the date of that letter or proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant; but I think it will be in the recollection of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House that Lord Spencer did take that course, which was a wise and a proper course, and led to the preservation of peace and order in the North of Ireland. That is the course the Government should take; for if they carry out the plan of suppressing meetings because counter demonstration are threatened, they will throw into the hands of the Orange Society in the North of Ireland the power of suppressing the right of public meeting in that part of the country. If the Government adhere to their present policy, then if a Nationalist demonstration were called the Orangemen would only have to send out a placard calling a meeting at the same place, on the same day, and then the Government would come to their aid and would prohibit the original meeting. I desire to call the attention of the House to the undeniable fact, that the ultimate course adopted by Lord Spencer was to say that whatever meeting—Nationalist Orange, or Home Rule—was first called for a particular day and place, he would allow it to be held, would protect it, and would not allow a counter demonstration at the same time and place. That is the course the Government should adopt instead of playing into the hands of the Orange Party, by suppressing a meeting in any part of Her Majesty's Dominions on the mere issue of an Orange placard.

Mr. W. H. SMITH: I think that this discussion may now terminate. It has now lasted nearly three quarters of an hour, and it is now nearly 2 o'clock. Hon. Members opposite have had an opportunity of making their statement, to which a full answer has been given. I therefore now claim to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Question be now put."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

EAST INDIA STOCK CONVERSION BILL.

(Sir John Gorst, Mr. Jackson.)

[BILL 267.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

Mr. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I beg to move, Sir, that, considering the circumstances of this measure, the Bill should be re-committed. I observe that there are on the Notice Paper five very substantial Amendments, and it would seem, so far as I am able to judge, that a great many of them are of very considerable length. Many of the Amendments also are new, and will require careful consideration. I do think that it must appear to the Government a very fair thing, after the considerable rapidity with which the measure has been advanced, to re-commit the Bill, and amend it to-night, and report it as amended to-morrow night.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be re-committed."—(Mr. Chance.)

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir John Gorst) (Chatham): I hope the hon. Member (Mr. Chance) will not deny that the Amendments are of such a character as that they may be readily dealt with. I do not think that there will be any great advantage derived from re-committing the Bill, and I would appeal to the hon. Member that, in the face of the circumstances, it would be but a quite reasonable thing to allow the Bill to proceed.

Mr. CHANCE: I find, Sir, that it will be necessary to make other Amendments, and I really believe that it would not only be easier, but tending to greater rapidity in advancing the Bill should it be re-committed.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think, Sir, that the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir John Gorst) will remember that he got us to compromise at 4 o'clock in the morning, and I believe he should now recognize that we have some claim on him, after he has got his clause. I would appeal to him that he should see his way to grant our most necessary and most modest request.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill re-committed; considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Power of trustees, &c., in relation to exchange of stock).

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 18, to leave out from "the consent of such person" to "Court of Session" in

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I am afraid, Sir, that if this alteration be made, that the clause will not read. I commend the fact to the attention of the right hon. Gentleman.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion of Sir John Gorst, the following Amendments made:—

In page 2, line 8, after "interested in the Stock or," insert "when any such person is an infant or a person of unsound mind the consent of his guardian or guardians or of the committee of his estate or curator bonis (as the case may be) or the consent;" in line 11, after "in pursuance of this section," insert "and when the holder in a joint account is an infant, or a person of unsound mind, or is under any other disability, or is beyond the seas, the other holders or holder may, with the consent of a Judge of the High Court of Justice in England and Ireland, or in Scotland of a Judge of the Court of Session, exchange in pursuance of this section such Stock or any part thereof for India Three and a-half Per Cent Stock."

"And when the holder is an infant or person of unsound mind his guardian or guardians, or the committee of his estate, or the curator bonis (as the case may be), may exchange in pursuance of this section such Stock or any part thereof for India Three and a-half Per Cent Stock."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

New Clause—

(Power to exchange stock up to £1,000 value standing in name of infant or of person of unsound mind.)

"Where the holder of Stock of less than one thousand pounds nominal value is an infant or a person of unsound mind, and no steps are taken on or before the tenth day of October one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven for the exchange of such Stock for India Three and a-half Per Cent Stock, such exchange shall be made notwithstanding that no consent may have been given by the guardian or guardians, trustee or trustees of such infant, or by the committee of the estate or custos bonis (as the case may be) of such person of unsound mind,"

—(Mr. Kelly,)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR JOHN GORST: What I have to say to this clause is, that though the Government would not have presumed to move such a clause, yet, if it is the general sense of the Committee that it should be inserted, the Government will raise no objection to it. No doubt, at the present time, 3½ per cent Stock and 4 per cent Stock are practically of equal value; and by this clause, if the House should think fit to add it to the Bill, these persons will have the exchange effected without any expense or trouble on their part, or on the part of those who represent them. Although the Government did not think it right for them to move the clause, neither do they feel called upon to oppose it.

MR. CHANCE: A necessity arises for the clause, because under the Bill as it stands the holder of Stock in whose name the Stock stands, as representative of an infant or a person of unsound mind, is bound to make application to a Judge of the High Court, for an order that shall entitle the Bank to change the 4 per cent Stock into 3½ per cent Stock. This will be an expensive affair for a small income. If such application is not made, then, according to the Bill as it stands, the Stock will be paid off on October 10, 1888, and the guardians or trustees will have to make application for a re-investment of the capital. Nothing could be done previously, and the unfortunate holders of the Stock, who have not power to vary their investment, would lose probably a year's dividend and perhaps more. Now this clause says that, unless anybody takes an objection, without any expense, the 4 per cent Stock shall be converted into 3½ per cent. It does not compel a guardian to take the new Stock because he can take measures, if he chooses, to invest the capital in another way, but it gives him the option of getting the benefit of the conversion without going to any expense whatever. The clause is limited to holders of less than £1,000 Stock, to save the smaller incomes of £30 or £40 a-year from the expense of transfer. Larger incomes may be left to bear the expense; it is in the interest of poor people with incomes of £30 or £40 a-year this clause is proposed, and who without it would lose certainly half-a-year's dividend on the expenses of an application to the Court. The clause, I think, is wholly unobjectionable in principle.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): It will be generally allowed, I think, that it is not possible for trustees to obtain any safe investment producing more than 3½ per cent at the present time, and that being so, it appears to me a very reasonable clause to insert.

MR. MAURIOE HEALY (Cork): I wish to know if the Mover of the clause draws a distinction between "custos bonis" and "curator bonis?"

MR. KELLY: It should be printed "curator bonis."

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACTS (IRELAND) AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

(Sir James Corry, Mr. Ewart, Mr. Johnston.)

[BILL 176.] COMMITTEE.

[Progress 12th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title).

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): This is a Bill of considerable importance, and a large number of important Amendments have been given Notice of, some of them, I have reason to believe, likely to give rise to considerable debate. Such a debate could not be satisfactorily taken at this late hour, and no report of the proceedings can reach my constituents and others in Ireland very much interested. I beg, therefore, to move, Sir, that you do report Progress.

Mr. Tomlinson

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Sexton.)

SIR JAMES CORRY (Armagh, Mid): My reason for pressing forward the Bill now is to fulfil a pledge given in the House in connection with another measure. We pledged ourselves to bring forward this measure as quickly as possible, and therefore I am anxious to proceed with it at once.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I hope the Committee will agree to the Motion of my hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton). There is one condition upon which we might go on now, and that is that the hon. Baronet shall not persist in his Amendment to exclude the rest of Ireland from the provisions of the Bill, applying them only to Belfast. If he can see his way not to press that, then I think we can concur, and the Bill can go through as a matter of course. We are now without the presence of any responsible Member of the Government, and that is a somewhat astonishing thing. Replying to a Question the other night, the Parliamentary Under Secretary for Ireland said that, when the Bill came on, we should have a statement of the policy of the Government thereon, and when I recalled this to the attention of the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury, and asked him what the Government would do, he unfortunately was not able to inform me. Had we persisted, we should have beaten the Government on the Motion of the Attorney General. I understand the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) is opposed to the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh, and that the hon. Member for East Belfast (Mr. De Cobain), and other distinguished Members on the other side, are opposed to the exclusion of all Ireland from the Bill. It is really an all Ireland Bill, and I am sure my hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) would not press his present Motion if we could pass the Bill with all Ireland included in it. The municipal franchise which this Bill would extend to Ireland exists in England and Scotland, and has done so for 15 or 20 years. The Committee will not sanction this exceptional treatment of one Municipality in the face of so many professions to treat all Ireland upon equal terms with England. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberland) is not going to exclude all Ireland from the provisions of a law that exists in England and Scotland, confining them strictly to Belfast. Absolutely, at the present moment, if there should be a necessity for a municipal election in Limerick, there is one of the wards of that borough without sufficient electors to have a contest. It would take 20 electors to have a contest; you must have 10 to fill up the nomination papers for A, and 10 more to fill up the nominations for B; and in one ward of Limerick there are only 18 electors! Under such circumstances, is it not absolutely absurd to restrict this Bill to Belfast? I think it is too absurd for anybody to consent to it. Will the Solicitor General for England (Sir Edward Clarke) vote for a Motion restricting this Bill to Belfast? If the Government are reasonable, I am sure my hon. Friend will withdraw this Motion. Give us the benefit of this extension of the law to the whole of Ireland, and you will find it will tend to facilitate the progress of Business. Will you refuse us that franchise that England has enjoyed for 20 years? When the Bill passed the second reading, it was applied to the whole of Ireland; it passed into Committee with the understanding that the Government would make a statement upon it; and now we have the Bill with the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry) confining it to Belfast. If you pass a Coercion Bill for us, at all events give us the benefit of your English Law for the whole of Ireland.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I hope the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) will withdraw his opposition, and allow this Bill to go on. As the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) said, I am entirely at one with and will vote with those who resist the distinction being made between Belfast and the rest of Ireland; but, at the same time, I trust that, whatever may be the result of a Division on the question, hon. Members will not deprive even one portion of Ireland of what unquestionably is the right of all Municipal Boroughs in Ireland—that is, to be placed on the same footing with Municipal Corporations in England. I hope the hon. Member for West Belfast will not persist with his Motion; and if there is a Division on the question, I shall certainly vote for the extension of the Bill to all Ireland.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I only wish to say that, whether the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry) passes or does not pass, it will make no substantial difference in the borough representation, except that it will allow a greater number of people to vote. The Orange population of the North will, for the first time, give a vote in the return of an Orange representative, and equally the Nationalist Party elsewhere will return their representatives by greater numbers.

MR. EWART (Belfast, N.): May I be allowed to recall the exact position in which the promoters stand in regard to this Bill? At your suggestion, Mr. Courtney, the Belfast Main Drainage Bill was postponed to May 20, that is to say, our next Sitting. You made the suggestion that in the interval steps should be taken to push forward the Bill for the extension of the Municipal Franchise of Belfast, and my hon. Friend has done his best to carry out this compromise—this arrangement. This Bill was put down for to-night, to meet the convenience of hon. Members opposite; and now we are met with the request that it shall be a Bill for the whole of Ireland. [Cries of "It is in the Bill!"] While I sympathize with the desire for this extension, it must be obvious that it is too large a subject to be taken up now; and under present circumstances, I hope hon. Members will assist us to get the measure through, and also the Main Drainage Bill that comes on to-morrow, for I must say we are doing our best to carry out the arrangement arrived at.

SIR JAMES CORRY (Armagh, Mid): I just wish to say that it is utterly impossible to pass this measure through for the whole of Ireland. [Cries of "Why?"] The hon. Member himself (Mr. Sexton), in making the addition to the Belfast Main Drainage Bill, only made the extension to Belfast, and I have brought in the Bill now as the result of the compromise and undertaking I gave.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The hon. Baronet is entirely mistaken. The majority of the Committee is not on his side; it rests here. It rests with the Liberal Unionists; but neither the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), nor the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), could vote for a Bill to restrict to Belfast the application of a law that extends to the whole of England, and that we say ought to be applied to the whole of Ireland. I challenge the noble Marquess who holds the balance of power in this House to vote for the application to Belfast alone, against the rest of Ireland, of a principle that has been the Law of England for 20 years. He would not do it; the most advanced or the most retrograde Unionist would not do it. I have several times tried to corkscrew the Government as to their intentions; but I have failed to get a reply. I have asked at Question time, and I was told I should get an answer when the Bill came on; but when the Bill comes on, the Government run away, and so this thing goes on. Will English Members support this exclusion of all Ireland? So far as the South of Ireland is concerned, it is wholly Nationalist. How will it matter then, except that you give a number of people votes who have not got them now? When Sir Charles Dilke was a Member of this House, he visited Ireland, and his Report has shown that absolutely in the City of Waterford—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. and learned Member that the Motion is to report Progress.

MR. FINCH-HATTON (Lincolnshire, Spalding): The Bill is one to amend the Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Act, and it is now proposed to confine its operation to Belfast. Why is it necessary to do that? I should like to know the reason?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Still no response from the Government Bench. Here we have 10 Gentlemen representing the Government, and they have not all lost the gift of speech. It is a most unreasonable silence. We do not expect a voice to be raised in application of Scotch Law to the question. I will ask the Solicitor General for England, or the Attorney General for England, or the Patronage Secretary, or the Financial Secretary, or any other Gentleman, to rise and say what the Government are going to do? It is most unreasonable that we should go to a Division without this. I scarcely know how to vote myself. Here is a Motion to report Progress, and though I support it, I would rather see the Bill go through in its entirety. Do the Government support or oppose it? Let us have a little "light and leading."

SIR JAMES CORRY: I can only say that if there is an attempt to push it through as it stands the Bill will be dropped. [Cries of "Why?"]

COLONEL NOLAN: The hon. Baronet (Sir James Corry) forgets that after the second reading, a Bill becomes the property of the House. But really this conduct of the Government is most extraordinary. I remember once Mr. Disraeli commented upon the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) sitting in solemn silence, but it was positive loquacity compared to the behaviour of the Government Bench now, for in that instance only one man remained silent, but here—my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford has carefully counted them—and there is that silence multiplied by 10. Surely we may have an opinion expressed whether they mean to support, oppose, or remain neutral?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I am not authorized to speak on behalf of the Government, nor am I able to speak as to the intention of the Government; but it does appear to me—and in this I am expressing my individual opinion—that, under the circumstances in which we find ourselves, my hon. Friend (Sir James Corry) would do well to accept the Motion that Progress should be reported. It is not a Government measure; and there is no one here entitled to speak of the intentions of the Government. I do not know what course the hon. Baronet intends to take, but I hope he will accept the Motion.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): After what has fallen from several hon. Members on this side, I would appeal to the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Sexton) to withdraw his Motion. For myself I desire to see every municipal borough in Ireland included in the Bill. I do not think we ought to restrict it to any particular class. It does not appear, however, there is any hope of getting the Bill through in its entirety; and I would appeal to hon. Gentlemen who desire this extension to acquiesce in this limitation, and I am sure they will be well supported when they propose to extend it to all other Corporations in Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The extension is in the Bill now.

MR. MACARTNEY: I quite understand that; but the Motion for Progress stands in the way.

MR. DE COBAIN: I have no objection to the principle of the Bill as it stands; but we have Notice of a great number of Amendments, important in character, and requiring that careful consideration which, at this late hour, I do not think they can receive. I think, under the circumstances, it would be well to report Progress.

Question put, and agreed to.

EGYPT—DURATION OF THE ENGLISH OCCUPATION—MISSION OF SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF.

POSTPONEMENT OF QUESTION.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I wish to ask my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Carnarvon), who has the following Notice on the Paper:—

"To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is in a position to give any explanation relative to Sir H. D. Wolff's negotiations in regard to the English occupation of Egypt."

to postpone it, as I am not able to give him any information at the present moment.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: As my noble Friend desires the postponement of the Question, I shall be very glad to do as he wishes. I find that the Notice Paper on Monday is so crowded, that it would be hardly possible to find room for the Question; and therefore it will be most convenient to postpone it till Friday, the 10th of June, when I shall move for the Papers on the subject.

CENTRAL ASIA (AFGHANISTAN)—THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN DELIMITATION COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY asked, Whether it is a fact that, in the negotiations with Russia as to the delimitation of Afghanistan, as has been recently stated in the newspapers, England and Russia have been unable to come to an agreement, or that negotiations have been broken off and the British Commissioners ordered to return to England?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): It is true that the Commission has not yet come to an agreement; but it is not true that negotiations have been broken off; and it is not true that any orders have been sent to the British Commissioners to return to England. As far as it is possible to forecast such matters, I think negotiations are more likely to last a longer than a shorter time. The matter is one that involves considerable difficulty, in consequence of its previous history, and will involve, I dare say, a great deal of discussion between the Commissioners.

LUNACY DISTRICTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.
(The Marquess of Lothian.)

(NO. 82.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of Lothian), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it had not been circulated, and that if their Lordships objected, he would postpone the Motion till Monday. The object of the Bill was simply to rectify a state of matters called into existence when the Prisons Act of 1887 was passed. By the Lunacy Act of 1857, powers were given to the General Board of Lunacy sitting in Edinburgh to alter lunacy districts; but the initiative rested in the General Prisons Board, which General Prisons Board was done away with by Section 69 of the Prisons Act of 1877. Consequently, there was now no authority to take the initiative in altering or varying, however desirable it might be, a lunacy district in any part of Scotland. This Act was simply to give to another Body, or, rather, to other Bodies—to the Commissioners of Supply of counties, to magistrates of burghs, and to Parochial Boards—power to apply to the General Board of Lunacy to alter or vary existing lunacy districts. Under the Act of 1857, the General Board had only power to make the districts areas consisting of not less than of counties, or of burghs; and it was now proposed, where the population was greatly increasing, to enable the Lunacy Board to make less districts than those allowed by the Act of 1857. The Bill did not propose any alteration of the existing law, and although it had not yet been printed and circulated, he hoped that their Lordships would now assent to the second reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Marquess of Lothian.)

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, he thought it would be establishing a bad precedent to allow a Bill which their Lordships had not seen to be read a second time.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, he would remind the noble Earl that when he (the Marquess of Lothian) got up to move the second reading, he put himself in their Lordships' hands, and offered, if the course he proposed was inconvenient, to postpone the second reading until Monday. Receiving no answer, he concluded he had the consent of the House to proceed.

In reply to The Earl of Wemyss,

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, the Bill had been presented 10 days ago.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a.

The Marquess of Lothian

PLURALITIES ACT AMENDMENT ACT
(1885) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 96.)

(The Lord Bishop of Bangor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE BISHOP OF BANGOR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its object was to repeal a portion of Section 2 of the Pluralities Acts Amendment Act, 1885, in order to restore to the Bishops of St. Asaph, Bangor, Landaff, and St. David's the power which was formerly possessed by them to require such ministrations in the Welsh language as they might think necessary in benefices within their respective dioceses, and which he contended the Act of 1885 had unduly limited. The desire was to enable the Bishop to arrange for two Welsh services each Sunday in parishes where such supply was necessary, and not to be obliged to limit the services to one conducted in Welsh and one in English. The right rev. Prelate moved the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Bishop of Bangor.)

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and at the end of the Motion to add ("upon this day six months.")—(The Earl of Powis.)

THE BISHOP OF ST. ASAPH, in supporting the Motion for the Second Reading, said, that he regretted very much to be obliged to differ from the noble Earl, who was so staunch a friend to the Church in Wales; but he did so because the existing Act was the cause of much discontent among the Welsh-speaking population of Wales. It was impossible for the Church to maintain a hold on the population in Welsh parishes with only one service in the Welsh language per day. They were anxious to correct the abuse, and the Bishops should be allowed freedom to arrange for two services in Welsh, and they should be trusted to make the necessary provision also for the English-speaking people. If the Bishops were not permitted to give two Welsh services each Sunday, the result would be that the people would be driven more and more into the Dissenting chapels. If the present Act were to remain in force without being amended as was now proposed, it would do more than anything else to promote the present movement for Disestablishment.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON was understood to draw the right rev. Prelate's attention to the wording of the section of the Act which the Bill sought to amend, and pointed out that under the section as it stood there was no compulsion on the Bishops as the right rev. Prelate seemed to contend; but that it was optional to him to enforce one service, leaving the other service to be a matter of agreement between him and the incumbent.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he should like to have some expression of opinion from the Government with regard to the Bill.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK) said, his impression with respect to the Bill was certainly in its favour; but he should propose that after the second reading some time should be given for consideration, in order to see whether any and, if so, what Amendments ought to be introduced in Committee.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? Resolved in the negative.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

SCOTLAND—HILLHEAD AND KELVINSIDE (ANNEXATION TO GLASGOW) BILL—THE BOTANIC GARDENS AND THE UNIVERSITY.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF STAIR, in rising to call attention to the consequences of a recent decision of a Committee of that House on the Hillhead and Kelvinside (Annexation to Glasgow) Bill as regards the Botanic Institution of Glasgow and the interests of the University of Glasgow and the public generally therein; and to inquire, Whether Her Majesty's Government will adopt such action as may be necessary to preserve the Gardens from being closed and the site appropriated to buildings and other purposes? said, the object of the Bill in question, which had come up from the Commons, the Preamble having been proved, but the Bill itself being thrown out by a Committee of their Lordships' House, was to annex the two small burghs of Hillhead and Kelvinside, a district which embraced the Botanic Gardens, which were 25 acres in extent. These Gardens, by the Bill, were to be transferred to the Corporation of the City of Glasgow, and were to be maintained by the Corporation in perpetuity as a public park. The Botanic Gardens Institution had got into financial difficulties recently, so much so, indeed, that it was necessary to get loans from the Corporation of Glasgow on the security of the land. These loans amounted, with interest, to between £46,000 and £50,000, and the Corporation of Glasgow had, in consequence of the rejection of the Annexation Bill, been forced to foreclose, and the Gardens passed into their hands on 1st April last. These Gardens were situated near to the University of Glasgow, connected with which there was a medical school attended by a very large number of students amounting in 1885 and 1886 to 694, of whom over 200 attended the Botanical classes. It was incontestable that a Botanic Garden, with proper appliances, was a sine quid non to the successful study of science. As the matter now stood, however, the Corporation of Glasgow were unable to continue the maintenance of these important Gardens, and there seemed to be only one course open, which he believed was, that the Gardens should be disposed of by sale for building purposes. That would, unfortunately, involve the destruction of the plant and glass houses recently erected at a cost of £20,000, and would also involve the dispersion of very valuable collections which had been accumulated during the past 50 years. He need hardly say that would be most detrimental to the interests of the University of Glasgow. He might also say that the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, and Edinburgh had Botanic Gardens, which were made use of regularly for the benefit of their medical students, and for which public grants were received in the case of Edinburgh, amounting to an annual sum of £1,600. For these reasons he had put the Question standing in his name on the Paper, and would appeal to the Government to take the case into their favourable consideration. He wished to make an acknowledgment due to the Corporation of the City of Glasgow, by stating that although these grounds were not available to the public just now, they had kindly made arrangements by which the students had access to them during the summer session.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, he was Chairman of the Committee before which the Bill referred to had been considered. The real object of the Bill was to secure the annexation of districts in the West End of Glasgow, which included the Botanic Gardens, and the Committee had decided that it should not proceed. Though his own individual opinion was in favour of the Bill proceeding, he was bound to say that the other Members of the Lords Committee gave the most careful attention to the subject, which was one of very great difficulty, and one on which a great deal might be said on both sides. The particular point raised by the noble Earl (the Earl of Stair) was, as he understood it, not on the merits of the general question raised by the Bill, but on the particular question of the Botanic Gardens. So far as he could gather from the noble Earl, it seemed that the Corporation of Glasgow, having lent money to the Botanic Gardens, they now proposed to sell the Gardens for building purposes. He (the Earl of Northbrook) could only say he hoped that the Corporation of Glasgow would not take that course. It did not appear to him that it was at all necessary; because they had already, as stated in the Preamble of the Bill, powers, under a previous Act, to arrange with the Trustees of the Botanic Gardens to take over the Gardens as a public park, and though it might be necessary in order to carry out that arrangement that some further legislation should take place, he could not think that the Corporation of Glasgow would find any difficulty in getting the sanction of Parliament to any such proposal. It might be said, certainly, that the district of Hillhead which lay between the University and the Gardens, not being annexed to Glasgow, it would be unfair to put the charge of the Botanic Gardens upon the City of Glasgow, while the people of Hillhead made no contribution towards the maintenance of the Garden; but the Committee had distinctly before them the statement of the Commissioners of Hillhead, that they were prepared to agree to any reasonable arrangement for rating the population of Hillhead in support of the Gardens in question. He did not think, therefore, that the Corporation of Glasgow would be justified, in consequence of the rejection of the Bill by their Lordships' House, in taking a step so very detrimental to the public interest as to sell the Gardens for building purposes. Before the Committee they had evidence from most distinguished Professors of the University, which entirely supported the statement of the noble Earl, of the great educational value of the Gardens, besides their value as a place of relaxation. Therefore, he trusted that some measure would be adopted to prevent so undesirable an act as that these Gardens should be utilized for building purposes.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, his attention had been called some time ago to the question how far it was important to annex outlying suburbs. His opinion, generally speaking, had always been that such suburbs, which were really part of a city, ought to resist annexation to a neighbouring town. Their general object was to escape the increased taxation involved, and he must say it was a legitimate object. But he must also say in this case, that two years ago, on looking into the facts, he said that Glasgow was quite entitled in going in for the annexation of those districts which were so thoroughly identified with the city, and were so thoroughly part of the city that annexation was necessary. One of the questions involved in the Bill was the support of the Botanic Gardens, one of the most valuable institutions in the district. The Gardens stood adjacent to the University, and were extremely important to the Medical School of the University. The citizens of Glasgow ought to think twice before they closed these valuable Gardens. He understood the people of the district were willing to bear a share of the maintenance of these Gardens, and he hoped, in the meantime, some arrangement might be made by which they would continue to be supported.

THE MARQUESS OF TWEEDDALE said, that having taken some interest in the Bill referred to by the noble Earl who had just put the question (the Earl of Stair), perhaps he might be allowed to say a few words. He did not propose to enter into the question of the desirability, or the contrary, of annexing the outlying burghs to the City of Glasgow, for that was not now before the House. Suffice it to say that the decision of the Committee of their Lordships' House had his entire concurrence, and was, indeed, in conformity with no less than four former decisions on the same subject. In regard to the maintenance of the Gardens, there was no ground for the statement of the noble Earl that there was only one course open to the Glasgow Corporation. The noble Earl who had just spoken (the Earl of Northbrook) referred to a proposal made by the burgh of Hillhead during the time the Bill was before the House, and repeated since, that the burghs of Hillhead and Kelvinside should contribute to their maintenance. The noble Earl did not state what that proposal was; and he (the Marquess of Tweeddale), therefore, begged to state it. The sum required to maintain the Gardens and pay the interest of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on the Glasgow Corporation's loan was £3,000 per annum. Now, of that it was proposed that the burghs of Hillhead and Kelvinside should contribute £2,000, and the Corporation of Glasgow £1,000. In other words, a community of 15,000 persons were willing to contribute £2,000 a-year, as against £1,000 a-year by the 500,000 inhabitants of Glasgow. He thought that would be admitted to be a most reasonable proposal; and it was impossible, in the face of it, and of the power which the Corporation already possessed, under the Act of Parliament before referred to, enabling them to purchase the Gardens, to contend that they were compelled to foreclose the mortgage and sacrifice the Gardens. It would almost seem as if the Corporation feared to loose the lever which the mortgage gave them wherewith to coerce the small burghs into annexation. At any rate, there seemed no solid ground or good reason for the extreme step which the Corporation appeared inclined to take.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN) said, that the Government would view with the greatest possible regret the abolition of the Botanic Gardens. Unlike the noble Duke, he had no personal acquaintance with the situation of the Gardens; but, from what he had been able to learn respecting them, it appeared to him that the maintenance of the Gardens was not only a question of great importance to the City of Glasgow, but also to the University. Every facility had been afforded, he believed, to the students of the University of Glasgow for making use of these Gardens; and it would be a distinct blow to the University, and it would handicap it in its relations as regarded the other Universities of Scotland, if these Gardens were abolished. Apart from that question, there was another which seemed to him to be of great importance—namely, this—that these Gardens were started about 70 years ago, and they had been growing and increasing in value from that time to this. Their area, he believed, was only short of Kew; and in extent they were, in fact, the second of the kind in the United Kingdom. The collection of plants they contained was in itself invaluable; but, if sold, it would bring nothing like the real value. As regards the suggestion of his noble Friend (the Earl of Northbrook), he must confess it seemed to him it was in the power of the City of Glasgow, as he understood, to promote some other Act which would enable trustees to take over the Gardens under the Glasgow Parks Act. In fact, by Clause 28 of last year's Act, the City of Glasgow would be able to take over the Gardens as a public park, and maintain them in the interests of the district. On the part of Her Majesty's Government, he would say, although they took very great interest in the question, he was afraid, as the noble Earl (the Earl of Stair) had not made any suggestion as to what course the Government should pursue, he could not make any suggestion himself. He could only say this—that if any practical suggestion could be made by the noble Earl, or by anyone else, by which these Gardens could be maintained, Her Majesty's Government would take it into their serious consideration, and would be very glad if, by any means, that object could be attained.

COLONIAL SERVICE (PENSIONS) BILL.

(NO. 98.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Onslow.)

LORD LAMINGTON said, he had been very glad to see that one result of the Colonial Conference had been that a step had been taken in the right direction by the Government in connection with this matter. It had always been a matter of the greatest regret to him, taking the interest which he did in the Colonial Service, that no class had been more neglected than those employed by Her Majesty's Government in the Colonies. Twenty years ago it had been left to him, as a private Member, to introduce a Governors' Pension Bill; until that period no Governor had received any pension at all. The Bill which he had introduced had been very considerably changed during its progress through Parliament, the period of service having been altered from six years to 18. He would endeavour to introduce some Amendment in the present Bill; and he trusted that now, when the public interest in Colonial matters was so great, justice would be done to those who served in the Colonies.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 14th of June next.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND ART— THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON, in rising to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the position of the National Portrait Gallery, said, he wished to remind their Lordships that two years ago, when Mr. Gladstone had been Prime Minister, the Trustees of the Gallery had agreed to allow the portraits to be removed from South Kensington to Bethnal Green, Captain Shaw having reported that they were not safe in South Kensington. That, however, had been done upon the distinct understanding that in two years' time they would be replaced in a proper position. The two years had now elapsed, and the pictures were still at Bethnal Green; nothing had been done, and apparently nothing was intended to be done. He (Lord Lamington) had objected to the step that was taken at the time, as he thought that a great injustice was done to those families who had given pictures to that most interesting and valuable Gallery, in which the public took so great an interest that 160,000 persons had visited it in the year before its removal from South Kensington. The Collection was really lost now in a general Museum, the visitors to which took little interest in historical portraits. For his own part, he deeply regretted the mode in which public works were now carried on in this country, and the utter lack of public spirit which seemed to prevail. Nothing, for instance, had yet been done with regard to Parliament Street, and the value of the property was increasing year after year. Such a method of conducting improvements, instead of being economical, was most expensive. In the case of the National Portrait Gallery, however, distinct obligations had been entered into by the Government two years ago, and the present Government were bound to carry out the pledges given by Mr. Gladstone's Government. He trusted, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government would give them an assurance that something would be immediately done.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, he was very glad that attention had been called to the subject, for he thought there seemed to be some probability of the Collection remaining at Bethnal Green now that it had been removed there. The fact was that many necessary things were left undone that ought to be done in consequence of having to square a popular Budget. The National Portraits had been driven from pillar to post in an unaccountable manner. First, they were in very bad rooms in Great George Street; then they were transferred to South Kensington, and placed over Spiers and Pond's refreshment establishment; then the fire occurred, when they were removed to Bethnal Green, on the distinct understanding that in two years provision was to be made for their reception in a permanent and central home. Mr. Plunket was most anxious that a permanent site should be granted for the Portrait Gallery. He had suggested the site next the India Office, but was always met with difficulties, on the score of expense, by the Treasury. The present Offices where the Board conducted their ordinary business were very small, and it was very desirable that some temporary accommodation should be found for exhibiting those pictures which from time to time were purchased, and which could not be removed to Bethnal Green. Under these circumstances, he earnestly hoped that the Government would take up the matter seriously, and that no further delay would take place in providing a suitable receptacle for the National Portraits.

THE EARL OF ELGIN said, that he had stated last year that the difficulty arose partly from want of funds, but also from the impossibility of dealing with sites in possession of the Government until the position of the new Government Offices was determined. He would point out, however, that at the present time there was a considerable plot of vacant land belonging to the Government in close proximity to the National Gallery, in the new street near Charing Cross; and he would suggest that it might be used with advantage as the site for the National Portrait Gallery.

LORD HENNIKER said, the noble Lord (Lord Lamington) would, no doubt, recollect an answer he gave to a Question on this subject in August, 1885. It was then considered that the Gallery in which the National Portraits were housed were unsafe. Several proposals were made, such as to place it in the West Gallery, to place it in the Natural History Museum, and so on. No place, however, was found to be available. It would be remembered that some of the Galleries at South Kensington were the old Galleries of the Exhibition of 1862. The South Gallery, where the pictures were placed, was pronounced unsafe, and so was the West Gallery. The East Gallery was devoted to the Indian Museum, facing Prince's Gate, and so was not available. Accordingly, the Collection was moved to Bethnal Green as the safest and best place, and where it was not only not wasted, but likely to be fully appreciated. To show that it was appreciated, he might say that, taking 10 years, 1876 to 1885 inclusive, the largest number of visitors at South Kensington was, in 1883, 146,187; while to take the last complete year at South Kensington and the only complete year at Bethnal Green—that was, 1884 and 1886—the numbers were in 1884 120,716, and in 1886 446,722. It must be recollected that the portraits were moved in September, 1885, and that the present was the month of May, 1887, so he could give no better comparison. In 1885 he stated that the First Commissioner of Works could give no pledge as to finding a permanent home for this Collection, but expressed his desire that a home should be found as soon as possible. He was glad his noble Friend had called attention to this question, and he was sure that no one was more anxious than his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner to find a permanent home for this valuable Collection. The noble Lord would recollect that the Office of Works depended a great deal on the favour of the Treasury. At present there were large schemes on foot for erecting public buildings, which were hung up for the time. This altered the circumstances of the case very much. The Office of Works could not take too many large schemes in hand at a time; and all he could say was that when an opportunity offered and Parliament granted the necessary funds—which he hoped they soon would—the plans would be ready. No plan had been decided on at present. The noble Earl (the Earl of Elgin) had spoken of the site in Hemming's Row. This had been most carefully considered, but there were grave objections against it. No doubt the suitability of this site would be carefully considered again when the proper time arrived. He stated in 1885 that the housing of the pictures at Bethnal Green was a temporary loan, and he thought that this should be distinctly understood—that they were only there till a permanent home could be provided. Meanwhile, they were in the safest and best place that could be found, and he thought he had clearly proved that they were not thrown away in their present position.

SITTINGS AND ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.—QUESTION.

In answer to The Earl of KIMBERLEY,

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the House would adjourn on Monday next, subject to certain formal Business from the House of Commons; but, practically, it would be on Monday; and it was proposed to meet again on Thursday, the 9th of June. He was aware that it was usual to meet on a Friday; but as they never did much on the first day except to put down Notices for other days, he thought they might utilize the 9th for that purpose.

House adjourned during pleasure.

House resumed.

MIDLAND GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY
OF IRELAND BILL (by Order).

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Dodds.)

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I do not rise for the purpose of offering any opposition to the third reading of the Bill. I did not do so yesterday, and all that I wish now is to direct the attention of the hon. Baronet the Member for South St. Pancras (Sir Julian Goldsmid) and the House to certain grave charges and serious imputations which have been made upon his character as Chairman of a Committee of this House, with which I was associated, in dealing with the Bill now before the House. I will not detain the House for many minutes; but it will be necessary for me to state, shortly, how these charges came to be made. This Bill, when it was before the Committee, was opposed by the Limerick and Waterford Railway Company, of which Mr. Spaight is Chairman, and the statements of which I complain are contained in a speech made by that gentleman at a meeting of the Limerick Harbour Board, over which he presided, and in a letter which Mr. Spaight wrote on the 9th of May. The importance of these accusations consists in the fact that Mr. Spaight occupies a very important position in the City of Limerick. As I have said, he is not only Chairman of the Limerick Harbour Board, but also Chairman of the Limerick and Waterford Railway Company, who opposed the Midland Great Western of Ireland Railway Bill. Speaking at Limerick, Mr. Spaight said—

"Mr. Grierson, manager of the Great Western Railway, gave important evidence; but he was not listened to. The Chairman, Sir Julian Goldsmid, absolutely turned aside, put his arms over the back of his chair, and affected to go to sleep. From the very commencement of the inquiry the Chairman seemed to have made up his mind on the question. He knew from the start that they had no chance owing to the apparent bias of the Chairman."

Speaking of the evidence, Mr. Spaight characterized it as laughable and absurd; but said that it seemed to have considerable weight with the Committee, or rather with the Chairman, who appeared to be the Committee. Later on he said—

"It was the duty of Limerick men to make some final effort to get themselves heard before the House of Lords' Committee, where they would get a fair and impartial hearing;"

implying, in so many words, that they had not received an impartial hearing at the hands of the Committee presided over by the hon. Baronet, and thereby casting a serious reflection upon the hon. Baronet and the Committee. I will now read an extract from a letter written on the 9th instant by Mr.

Spaight to The Daily Express, containing more serious charges against the character of the hon. Baronet—

"We complain," says Mr. Spaight, "that the Chairman of the Committee held and expressed such a strong feeling in favour of the promoters and against the Petitioners from the opening of the case, that everyone who listened to the proceedings was quite satisfied, from the first day, what the decision would be. Our opponents will, I think, admit that such was the general impression," thereby imputing that the hon. Baronet had made up his mind as a partizan of the Midland Company. Now, I was an opponent of Mr. Spaight on that occasion; but his evidence was attentively listened to. It is not for me to defend the character of the hon. Baronet; but, having attended the Committee, I am decidedly of opinion that the hon. Baronet's conduct was fair and impartial. He gave, I think, a very fair and a very attentive hearing to the whole case. In submitting the case to the House, I do not propose to suggest any particular line of action. I have considered it my duty, as my attention has been directed to the subject, to bring it before the House. I think it is a great hardship and a serious matter that any Committee of this House should be liable or open to an attack by the promoters or the opponents of any Bill that may come before the House simply because they have happened to be unsuccessful. I do not propose to make any Motion on the matter; but, having brought the question under the attention of the House and the hon. Baronet, I will leave the House to deal with it as it thinks best.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): Copies of the letters written by the gentleman referred to were sent to me from time to time; but I thought they were very little worthy of notice, and that the best plan I and the Committee could adopt was to ignore them altogether. The gentleman who wrote them was formerly a Member of this House, and, therefore, knows something of the duties of the House. I myself have served as Chairman of many Committees; but I have never maintained that Committees are infallible. I am free to admit that they sometimes make mistakes, and, as far as I am concerned, I may sometimes be right and sometimes be wrong. In this case, however, I consider that the Committee arrived at a right decision. This gentleman, Mr. Spaight, has no ground of complaint whatever. It so happened that he attacked personally several witnesses who came before the Committee on account of the evidence he gave, and it became my duty as Chairman to call him repeatedly to Order. I think he did not like it, and the result is that he has amused himself by writing these letters. Under these circumstances, as far as the Committee is concerned, I do not think it necessary to take any further notice of the matter.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I wish to ask you, Sir, whether—as this question has been raised, and the House is not asked to come to a decision upon it on the ground that it is scarcely of sufficient importance—whether you think it is proper or right that persons examined either in support of or against a Private Bill should, after the inquiry was over, go away and make at public meetings, or in the newspapers, attacks upon the conduct or character of the Gentlemen who have been sitting on the Committee? I understand that Members serving on a Private Bill Committee have the same right to the protection of the House as they have when discharging their duty in the House itself, and that, under such circumstances, an attack made upon the Members of a Private Bill Committee is equivalent to an attack made upon the House itself.

MR. SPEAKER: In substance the view of the hon. Member is perfectly correct. An attack made upon the Members of a Committee is equivalent to an attack made upon the House itself. No witness has a right to go away from a Committee Room and then impugn the character of the Gentlemen who compose the Committee. The hon. Member for Clare (Mr. Cox) was good enough to show me the grounds of his complaint before bringing it under the notice of the House. I think he was undoubtedly right in bringing it under the attention of the House, and having done that I am of opinion that the charges are of such a nature that I think the House may well take no further notice of the matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

BELFAST MAIN DRAINAGE BILL

(by Order).

LORDS AMENDMENTS. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [28th April], "That the Lords Amendments be now taken into consideration."

Question again proposed.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I find it necessary to ask the House to agree to the further adjournment of the debate. When the question last came up, about three weeks ago, on the 28th of April, the adjournment of the debate was ordered, because the House of Lords had struck out of the Bill a clause extending the franchise of the town of Belfast. We felt in the House that it was necessary to give the ratepayers control over the execution of this scheme of main drainage, seeing that it involved an expenditure of £500,000. The clause struck out of the Bill in the House of Lords provided the necessary machinery for conferring this control upon the ratepayers, and it was felt that until some steps could be taken to extend the local government of Belfast so as to give the general body of ratepayers, not only control over the execution of the works, but also some control over the expenditure connected with the scheme, it was undesirable to pass the measure itself. The object of the adjournment was to afford time to both Houses of Parliament to consider the question of the extension of the franchise in a more regular manner in regard to the various boroughs of Ireland. I moved on that occasion the postponement of the consideration of this Bill until the 20th of July, because I felt that, having regard to the state of Public Business, an adjournment for three weeks would be insufficient for the purpose. But, in deference to the suggestion of the Chairman of Ways and Means, I amended the proposal by moving that the debate should be adjourned until the present day; but, as I then anticipated, the interval which has elapsed has been insufficient for the purpose. The Franchise Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry) has not yet left the House of Commons, although it has reached the Committee stage. It came on this morning at 3 or 4 o'clock, far too late to enable the House to consider the Bill, and in the absence of the Members of the Government who were competent to deal with the question. If it had not been for that circumstance, the Bill might have been passed through Committee this morning, and have been down for a third reading to-day. I hope that it will pass through Committee to-night, and go up to the House of Lords before the holidays, so that before the date which I originally fixed—the 20th of July—it may be passed into law. But if we proceed to-day to discuss the Lords' Amendments, I shall be compelled to move that the House disagree with them seriatim, and I shall be obliged to make each of them the subject of a Division.

MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but I must point out that he has already spoken on the Motion before the House.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): I beg to move that the consideration of the Lords' Amendments be postponed until the 20th of July.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Upon the point of Order, Sir, may I ask whether an hon. Gentleman who moves the adjournment is not capable of continuing the discussion on another occasion?

MR. SPEAKER: No. The hon. Member who moved the adjournment has exhausted his right, having already addressed the House. May I also point out that the date moved by the hon. Member for Leitrim is a rather distant one? I had, on another occasion, to rule that the postponement of a Bill until so late a date as that would virtually defeat the measure. I would, therefore, ask the hon. Member to propose a nearer date, in accordance with the ordinary practice of the House.

MR. CONWAY: In compliance with your suggestion, Sir, I will move that the debate be adjourned until the 20th of June.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "on Monday 20th June."—(Mr. Conway.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. EWART (Belfast, N.): I shall oppose that Motion. When this Bill was last before the House the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) moved the adjournment until the 20th of July, on the ground that the House, in the interval which would elapse, would pass the Bill for the extension of the franchise, whereupon the Chairman of Ways and Means proposed that the consideration of the Lords' Amendments should be postponed until the 20th of May—this day—in order that, in the interval, steps should be taken to push forward the Bill which then stood in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry). Since then my hon. Friend has entered into an engagement to limit the provisions of that Bill to the borough of Belfast, and that engagement has been accepted by Members on this side of the House, and by certain hon. Gentlemen opposite. In the interval which has elapsed my hon. Friend has done everything that was possible to carry out that arrangement. The Bill has been blocked, and has met with opposition in several quarters; but, acting in good faith, with a sincere desire to carry out the arrangement now come to, my hon. Friend succeeded in getting the block removed, and the Bill came before the House last night. [Mr. SEXTON: No; this morning.] Or, rather, this morning. The Bill was again opposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite, on the ground that it limited the extension of the franchise to the borough of Belfast. Hon. Members below the Gangway contend that all Ireland should be included; but I may point out that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Armagh would not have succeeded in getting the block removed, and thereby would not have been enabled to bring the Bill on at all last night, unless he had entered into the understanding that the provisions of the measure should be limited to the borough of Belfast. Unless my hon. Friend had done that, it would have been simply impossible to bring the measure forward; and, under these circumstances, it would be dishonourable on our part to give any aid to any measure which goes further than the extension of the municipal franchise to the borough of Belfast. For these reasons, I feel it impossible to accede to the Motion of the hon. Member for Leitrim. The Bill for the extension of the franchise will come before the House this evening; and hon. Members, if they are willing to carry out the arrangement suggested by the Chairman of Ways and Means, will be able to make progress with the Franchise Bill to their hearts' content.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): When the question was previously before the House I took occasion to point out the danger of allowing this Bill to leave the House of Commons until such time as we had previously secured the passage of the Municipal Franchise Bill. Now, Sir, since then the Municipal Franchise Bill has undoubtedly made very considerable progress, and there is no reason to doubt that it will pass this House in the course of a very few days. Under these circumstances, we are bound to ask whether the Municipal Franchise Bill will receive the same consideration in "another place" as it has received at our hands? Therefore, I think it is our duty to suspend the Belfast Main Drainage Bill until we have satisfied ourselves that that Bill has been passed in "another place." We have repeated precedents of such a course. We have the precedent of the Lords themselves, who have frequently suspended a Bill in that House pending the passage through this House of other Bills. Therefore, I think it is a precedent on which we may fairly act in this House also. It has been proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Leitrim to adjourn the debate upon this Bill until the 20th of July; but you, Sir, said that so long a postponement would have the effect of killing the Bill, and, acting upon your suggestion, my hon. Friend withdrew the original Motion, and substituted the 20th of June. The House is now about to adjourn for a fortnight; it will re-assemble on the 6th of June, and there will only be a space of 12 days, or less than two weeks, left with which any progress can be made with the Municipal Franchise Bill. I do not know whether the Town Council of Belfast will meet more than once or twice during that space of time, and I certainly fail to see how any rapid progress is to be made with the Bill before that date. As a matter of fact, the hon. Member for North Belfast (Mr. Ewart) would absolutely lose nothing by acceding to the Motion of my hon. Friend; because considering the time of year we have now arrived at, and the Recess which is about to take place, I cannot conceive how any further progress is to be made with the Main Drainage Bill, although it may be possible, on the other hand, to make material progress with the Municipal Franchise Bill. Under these circumstances, as the hon. Gentleman cannot possibly be injured by the Motion of my hon. Friend, and seeing that the interests of those persons who are connected with the Main Drainage Bill cannot be damaged by a further postponement, I hope the hon. Gentleman opposite will have the grace to withdraw his opposition to the Motion of my hon. Friend, and not put the House to the trouble of a Division.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I also feel it my duty to oppose the Motion. It will be in the recollection of hon. Members that the influence of the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means induced the House to consent to the adjournment of the Bill until this day. It will be a serious inconvenience and a great loss to the town of Belfast if there is any further postponement. The state of the Lagan River at the present moment is a disgrace to Belfast, and is a crying evil. The Belfast Town Commissioners have passed a Resolution almost unanimously, for I believe there were only two dissentients, calling upon this House to consent to this Bill without any further delay. I hope, therefore, the House will consent to the Bill without any further postponement. Not only have the Town Commissioners of Belfast passed a Resolution in favour of the Main Drainage Bill, but another influential body has given its support to the scheme; and I think that is a sufficient proof that the people of Belfast want it. The Franchise Question has made considerable progress in this House, and if it has not made more progress hon. Members will be aware that that fact has not been owing to any action on the part of the promoters of the Main Drainage Bill. The municipal franchise would have been conferred by this House on the people of Belfast but for the opposition given to this Bill last month by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), who, notwithstanding the sympathy he has frequently expressed in this House towards the extension of the franchise to the people of Belfast, took the extraordinary course last night of opposing the Franchise Bill.

MR. SEXTON: I gave no opposition whatever to that Bill last night.

MR. JOHNSTON: You certainly moved to report Progress.

Mr. M. J. Kenny

MR. SEXTON: No doubt, but it was at 3 o'clock in the morning.

MR. JOHNSTON: If a Motion to report Progress is not opposition to a Bill I fail to understand what opposition is. I trust that the promoters of the Bill will have the support of the House on this occasion, and that no further Motion for the adjournment of the debate will be acceded to, so that the measure will now receive the consideration it deserves. I trust that the Lords' Amendments will be approved of, and that the Bill will be passed through its final stages in the interests of the people of Belfast.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The hon. Member for South Belfast has, with his habitual inaccuracy, taken exception to what occurred this morning. Now, I gave no opposition to the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry); but I believe that the course I took met with the general concurrence of the House. Previous to the Bill being reached there had been an exhaustive Sitting of 11 hours, and there were numerous important Amendments upon the Paper against the Bill. Many Members also had left the House; and, therefore, I felt it my duty to move that Progress should be reported. I am not an enemy to the Franchise Bill. I am a friend of the Bill, and those who are the enemies of the Bill, although they claim to be its friends, are hon. Gentlemen opposite. For some reasons, which I have not been able to fathom, the provisions of the Bill are now limited to the borough of Belfast. I wish to assure the House that they will make a great mistake, and produce a most profound resentment among the community of Belfast—a community already sufficiently troubled by a variety of other causes—if they attempt to pass this Bill, and impose a burden of £500,000 upon the people, if they do not take care that they give the people of Belfast some control over the execution of the works and the expenditure of the money. The hon. Member for South Belfast has stated that the people of that town are unanimously in favour of the main drainage scheme, and he has referred to the River Lagan. Why, at this moment the Lagan Pollution Committee have sent a telegram to me, which I have only just received, stating that they—

"Confidently expect my assistance in securing the postponement of the Main Drainage Bill pending the settlement of the franchise in accordance with the popular desire of the people of Belfast."

Representations of a similar character reach me every day, and the hon. Gentleman knows very well that this scheme was prepared by a private Committee of the Corporation, and that it has never been submitted to the ratepayers at any public meeting, although public meetings have been held against it. Nevertheless, the hon. Member has the hardihood in this House—a House sitting in London, and not in Dublin—to say that the opinion of the community of Belfast is in favour of passing this Bill. It was at the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means that on the 28th of April we postponed the Bill, and the grounds on which that postponement took place have not yet been complied with. The object was to secure time for the passing of the Franchise Bill, and will any hon. Gentleman opposite say that there has not been sufficient time for that purpose? No doubt I proposed the adjournment of the Franchise Bill for two days for the purpose of consulting my Colleagues—namely, from Tuesday until Thursday. It must be remembered that the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh has materially altered the scope of the Franchise Bill. We claim that it should be passed for the whole of Ireland; but even if it be limited only to the town of Belfast, and is passed in that form, we shall be satisfied to withdraw our opposition to the Main Drainage Bill. It is idle to tell me that the Franchise Bill will be passed as soon as we have disposed of this Bill. I cannot forget that the Drainage Bill will place in the hands of a small ring in Belfast the power of spending £500,000 of the ratepayers, and by the time the Franchise Bill passes into law the people of Belfast may find themselves saddled with the payment of £35,000 a-year for 40 years to come. I tell you that if you pass this Bill I will go to Belfast and advise the ratepayers of that city, if they will listen to my voice, not to pay 1*d.* to the municipal rates until such arrangements are made as will enable them to exercise control over the expenditure of the rates. If that is done I fail to see how the main drainage scheme will be carried into operation. I was about to say, when I was interrupted on a point of Order a short time ago, that in discussing this matter I should have to raise a Constitutional question. The House of Lords have, on technical grounds, struck out the Franchise Clause, which was inserted by the House of Commons, the ground being that no Notice of that clause was given by the promoters at the time the Bill was deposited. As a matter of fact, no such Notice could have been given, because the promoters had no intention of inserting the clause. If the House refuse to consent to the adjournment of the debate it will be my duty to go into that question at length, and to put it to the House whether the House of Lords are constitutionally entitled, upon a Standing Order intended to be used against the promoters of a Private Bill, to object to the Constitutional right of this House to make any amendment in a Bill which it is pleased to make? I have placed Notices on the Paper which I intend to submit for the amendment of the Municipal Franchise Bill. The object of those clauses is to provide that, at the next annual municipal election for Belfast after the passing of the Act, every seat in the Municipal Council shall become vacant as if the period of occupancy prescribed by law had expired, and that there shall be a new election for every seat in the Council; and also to provide that until the new Council shall have been elected no action shall be taken or liability incurred in respect of the main drainage scheme. The object of those clauses is to afford an opportunity to the people of Belfast for obtaining some real control over the execution of the works, and the expenditure which may be involved. Without some such provision it will take three years before the entire Municipal Council can be elected under the Franchise Bill. Only one-third of the Council retire this year, a second third next year, and the remaining third the year after. Therefore, three years will elapse before the ratepayers will obtain any control over the expenditure connected with the scheme. I denounce that as a mockery and a sham, and I claim the support of the Chairman of Ways and Means to the Motion made by my hon. Friend, not that I desire any prolonged adjournment which, Sir, in your wisdom, as the Head of this House, you consider would be unreasonable, but a moderate adjournment which will enable the House to prosecute the Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh, and to send it to the House of Lords, by which means only you will be able to get rid of the conflict which now exists between the two Houses, and which, if no means of that nature are taken, will inevitably lead to an angry debate.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): I confess that I have been taken by surprise at the course which has been pursued in reference to this Belfast Main Drainage Bill. When this Bill was last before the House I was necessarily absent through a business engagement in Ireland; and I had hoped under those circumstances, in deference to the fact that I was unable to be present to represent the views of those who think with me in reference to this measure, that the promoters of it would have permitted it at that time to be adjourned; but they adopted the less chivalrous course of pressing it on when they knew I could not be present. The Main Drainage Bill now under consideration has the support of scarcely anybody outside the Corporation of Belfast. It is perfectly true, as the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) has stated, that there have been two Resolutions arrived at by two Public Bodies in support of the Bill; but one of those Public Bodies—the Belfast Water Commissioners—passed a Resolution approving of a main drainage scheme, but not necessarily of this main drainage scheme. The Belfast Harbour Commissioners, another important Body, came to a decision to support the Bill; but the Resolution was brought forward at a meeting without due notice having been given, and it was not unanimously carried. With regard to the public feeling in relation to the Bill in Belfast, I may fairly and frankly state that no public meeting has been held in support of the provisions of the measure, whereas several public meetings, representing, among others, persons largely connected with the principal interests of Belfast, have been held, and have with unanimity condemned it. I think that, under such circumstances, to insist upon the House of Commons coming to a decision upon the merits of the question to-day would be exceedingly unfair to the ratepayers of Belfast. We have, at present, a limited municipal franchise. The municipal burgesses roll consists of about 6,000 electors, whereas we have a Parliamentary roll comprising 33,000 householders. I understand that a statutable enactment makes it binding in all the towns of England to call a town's meeting to approve of all public schemes which involve the expenditure of the ratepayers' money before they are carried into effect. Such a provision, unfortunately, does not apply to the town of Belfast. If it had done so, and the ratepayers had been required to consider the matter before the promoters brought their Bill into Parliament, I believe the people of Belfast would almost unanimously have condemned the provisions of the measure. I know that it is a painful matter to keep a public question like this dangling for so long a time, and that the argument against further delay derives some force from its being postponed more than once before. At the same time, no one can deny the equity and justice of the demand now made that the people who will be required to pay the cost of this main drainage scheme should have the right to say "Yea" or "Nay" to it. In deference to the opinion already expressed in this House, and the decision lately come to in regard to the Main Drainage Bill, it is only a matter of equity towards the people of Belfast that the measure extending the municipal franchise shall come into operation before this Bill finally becomes law. Under these circumstances, I do not see why the promoters should not consent to a further adjournment—that is to say, if they are sincere, and if they are really honest in desiring that the working people of Belfast should have the privilege which is already enjoyed by the working people of Dublin, and by every other great community in the Empire. I do not see why the working people of Belfast are not as capable and as fairly entitled to enjoy the privilege of the municipal franchise as any other community. I do not see why a measure of this kind, which proposes to impose a public debt upon the town of Belfast of £500,000, and to increase the municipal taxation to the extent of 20 per cent, should be hurried through the House, especially when it is perfectly notorious that there is an ample source of revenue in the hands of the Corporation which would enable them to carry out this main drainage scheme without adding one single ld. to the rates. In a question which will so seriously effect the financial interests of the whole people, I think the fairest course for the promoters to adopt would be to say—"We will suspend any action in regard to the passing of the Bill until all the ratepaying classes of Belfast and all the householders have an opportunity of expressing their concurrence in this Bill or their disapproval of it." I was sorry to see the Bill for the extension of the municipal franchise delayed again last night; but I must altogether dissent from the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston), that the delay was occasioned by the action of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton). The hon. Member for West Belfast, no doubt, was of opinion that the hour was too advanced for the consideration of the question, and of all the Amendments which stood upon the Paper. In that opinion I cordially concurred. The hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), and others sitting on the other side of the House below the Gangway, expressed not only an opinion in favour of the principle of the Bill, but in favour of the extension of the municipal franchise throughout the whole of the corporate boroughs of Ireland. From that view some hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House appear to dissent. I myself have no objection to an extension of the municipal franchise to all the corporate towns of Ireland. But as yet we have only got an expression of a desire in that direction from the town of Belfast, and we are not aware that all other corporate towns of Ireland are in favour of an extension of the municipal franchise. In Belfast itself there have been public meetings held in opposition to this Bill, and in favour of the extension of the municipal franchise, so that we know the feeling of Belfast fully and clearly on the subject. I think that in deference to that feeling the House of Commons should permit this Bill to be further adjourned until such time as the municipal franchise has been extended, and we are in a position to recognize the fact that all the ratepaying people of Belfast will have an opportunity of expressing their concurrence in the scheme of the promoters, or their dissent from it.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. COURTNEY) (Cornwall, Bodmin): The House is in a position, I am afraid, of considerable embarrassment in respect of this Bill; and certainly, as far as I am myself concerned, I feel not only in a position of some embarrassment, but also to a certain extent of vexation. I cannot help thinking that the proposal I made a few weeks ago ought to have been more successful in securing a satisfactory result than it has been. The situation is this. A scheme for the drainage of Belfast went last year before a Select Committee of this House—a Private Bill Committee. The hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) a short time ago expressed the greatest confidence in the impartiality of Select Committees of this House.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I said where politics were not involved.

MR. COURTNEY: Yes; where politics were not involved. But the method to be adopted in regard to the drainage of the town of Belfast is not a question involving politics; and, therefore, I can see no reason why the decision of a Private Bill Committee on this Bill should not receive the same support of this House which the decisions of Private Bill Committees usually receive. After the Bill came back to us from the Committee a clause was introduced into it on Report extending the municipal franchise in Belfast, and in that form it passed this House. The Bill then went up to the House of Lords, who struck out that clause, re-examined in detail the whole of the drainage scheme, heard all the opposition that could be made to it, and affirmed the propriety of the scheme generally. The scheme of drainage, therefore, which is contained in this Bill for the town of Belfast has been affirmed and sanctioned by Committees of both Houses, and that fact is undoubtedly one which deserves our consideration. That is the present situation. Although the Bill has been opposed by the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), on the last occasion when the subject was before the House the hon. Member admitted that he was quite willing to allow the measure to go on if the municipal franchise were extended, so that his opposition was not to this scheme as a drainage scheme, but he desired to make it compulsory to proceed with the Bill for the extension of the franchise. What the hon. Member has stated to-day confirms that view—namely, that this scheme for drainage, whatever may have been said about it at any public meeting in Belfast, is, on its merits, a drainage scheme which ought to receive the support of this House. It comes before us with the approval and the authority of two Committees, and with the implied approval of the hon. Member for West Belfast. When the question was under discussion on the last occasion, there was a Bill before the House promoted by the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry) for the extension of the franchise in certain boroughs in Ireland. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Eleven in all.] I understood that the measure received general assent, not only on this side, but upon the other side of the House; and I suggested that if this Bill were postponed for three weeks there might be a prospect, in the meantime, of pushing forward the Municipal Franchise Bill, and passing it into law. I had no idea at that time that the Bill would be cut down to a Bill for extending the franchise in Belfast only. That was no part of my idea, although, no doubt, it was for the purpose of putting that principle in operation in Belfast that the suggestion was then made. As soon as the proposal to postpone the Bill for some weeks was made, it was followed by the hon. Baronet the Member for North Antrim (Sir Charles Lewis), who intimated that if nobody else would block the Franchise Bill he would. The hon. Baronet did block the Bill; but the block was subsequently taken off, and we have been informed this afternoon that it disappeared in consequence of some arrangement that the provisions of the Franchise Bill should be confined to the town of Belfast. It must not, however, be forgotten that the Bill was also blocked by the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner). The promoters of the Franchise Bill now feel under a debt of honour not to go on with it unless it is accepted upon those lines. I confess that, personally, I am sorry that the Bill has been restricted in its scope; but, at the same time, I believe there is a precedent for extending by a Public Bill the municipal franchise in one of the boroughs of Ireland. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Dublin.] Yes; the City of Dublin. It is now proposed to proceed on the same lines in regard to the City of Belfast, leaving out the other 10 boroughs of Ireland. If the proposal to adjourn the present Bill until the 20th of June were coupled with an undertaking not to oppose the modified

Bill, I think the House might listen to the proposal for the further adjournment of the debate; but there would not be the slightest use in adjourning the debate until the 20th of June if it is understood that the progress of the Municipal Franchise Bill is to be blocked again, so that, in its modified shape, it will not be allowed to go on. The promoters of the Bill have pretty plainly intimated that they will not go on with it except in its modified form. Therefore, if that Bill cannot go on in any other shape than its restricted application to Belfast, the House, I think, had better come to a decision to-day as to whether it will accept this scheme of main drainage, approved, as it has been, by Private Bill Committees of both Houses, or whether it will refuse to assent to it in consequence of the state of the franchise in Belfast. That is the practical question, and I hope it will be decided in a practical manner. I confess, for my own part, that leaving the other 10 boroughs out of consideration, if the understanding is come to that the Bill for the extension of the franchise in Belfast alone will go on, it would not be reasonable to hang up the Drainage Bill until that measure becomes law. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) has a number of Amendments on the Paper in reference to the Bill for the extension of the municipal franchise. I must tell him, however, that one of the clauses he proposes to insert is of an unusual and objectionable character, inasmuch as it requires that the operation of this particular Bill shall be hung up until the Municipal Council has been reconstituted.

Mr. SEXTON: That was the course taken in the case of Dublin, which has already been referred to.

Mr. COURTNEY: The first clause which the hon. Member proposes may be admissible in an amended form, but the second clause which he proposes would not be admissible as an Amendment in the Bill in Committee. It is not within the scope of the Bill, and could not be introduced in Committee. It may be proposed on the Report stage, but not in Committee. I only desire that the hon. Member for West Belfast should not be under any misapprehension in that respect. The best way to get out of the difficulty in which we are now placed will be, I think, to agree that the Municipal Franchise Bill should be extended to Belfast only; and if an arrangement of that kind is come to, then the promoters of the Bill might be satisfied to consent to an adjournment of the present debate until the 20th of June.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The House will remember that when this Bill was under discussion on the last occasion I moved the adjournment of the debate until to-day. I did so on a perfectly distinct and specified ground. I stated that I did not know anything about the merits of the Bill itself, but that I considered it absurd to tax the people of Belfast to the extent of £500,000, with so limited a franchise in the town of Belfast itself. Well, Sir, there is a Bill now before the House for extending the franchise.

MR. SEXTON: No; for extending it generally in all the boroughs of Ireland.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I am in favour of extending the franchise generally in all the boroughs of Ireland, but I am not prepared to prevent Belfast from getting it because the majority of the House are not willing to confer it upon all the other boroughs. The difficulty which arose this morning in reference to the Franchise Bill arose from Members below the Gangway, and was in no way due to the hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill (Sir James Corry); and as my opposition was limited to the question of the franchise, I am bound to say that if the Bill goes to a Division I shall now support it.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): With regard to what has fallen from the Chairman of Ways and Means I should like to say one or two words. It is perfectly correct that I said I had faith in the decision of a Committee of this House where politics are not concerned. No doubt, Select Committees of both Houses have approved of this main drainage scheme; but in this instance there is a distinct political issue raised, and although this House may approve, in the abstract, of the drainage of Belfast, or the drainage of the watershed of Central Africa, seeing that there would be no political question as to where the outfall should be, and would be indifferent as to the cost of it; but when, in this particular instance, we have the additional fact that the entire Town Council of Belfast are opposed by the general body of the ratepayers, although they are of the same religion and political principles as themselves, there must be something involved in the measure far beyond the ordinary engineering details of a Private Bill. We are told that there has been no town's meeting convened by the Town Council in support of the Bill, and I maintain that mere engineering matters sink into insignificance, and that the opposition to the measure arises from much more important principles. The real question is, have the people of Belfast had an opportunity of approving the measure? The Member in charge of the Franchise Bill is an expelled Member for one of the Divisions of Belfast, having been expelled by the present Member for East Belfast (Mr. De Cobain), who had been borough cashier to the Corporation of Belfast at a salary of £1,000 a-year. The Corporation dismissed him from that position because he had the audacity to oppose the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry). The hon. Gentleman, nevertheless, persisted in his opposition to the hon. Baronet, and, notwithstanding the exercise of the entire power of the Town Council, succeeded in expelling the hon. Baronet from the representation of East Belfast. Her Majesty's Government, however, gave the hon. Member for Mid Armagh the usual consolation of a Baronetcy, and he has been returned since to represent Mid Armagh. That fact shows, I think, that a deep feeling exists in the town of Belfast upon these questions. Perhaps the House will allow to me to refer for a moment to the argument of inconvenience. I presume that Her Majesty's Government are seriously anxious to save the time of the House, and if the time of the House is wasted the Government have only themselves to thank for the shuffling way in which they have treated the matter. Ten days ago I asked the Government if they were going to support the Motion of the hon. Baronet to confine the Franchise Bill to Belfast alone. The First Lord of the Treasury said he could not answer the Question; and, therefore, I put the same Question to the Under Secretary for Ireland, and he said that at the proper time he would answer the Question. Now, "the proper time" occurred very late at night, and neither the Attorney General for Ireland, nor the Chief Secretary, nor the Under Secretary chose to be in his place, although they were all in their places a few moments before, when a Division was taken on the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill. The moment the Division was taken they skedaddled, well knowing that this Bill was coming on. Now, I considered that that was a most unfair way in which to treat the House, and I said I would not allow the House to go into Committee until we had a statement from the Government. Upon the distinct understanding that the Bill was to extend to the whole of Ireland I did not oppose the Motion for going into Committee. It was not until pressure was put on the hon. Member for North Antrim (Sir Charles Lewis) from his own side that the block he had placed against the Bill was withdrawn, and we are now told that the block was only withdrawn on the distinct understanding with the hon. Baronet the Member for North Antrim that the provisions of the Bill shall only apply to the borough of Belfast. But there was another block against the Bill, which had been placed on the Paper by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner).

MR. COURTNEY: It was admitted last time that that was an indiscretion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork never acts with indiscretion, but as a matter of principle. My hon. Friend withdrew the block on an appeal being made to him from this side of the House, and the block of my hon. Friend was removed by us, just as the block of the hon. Baronet the Member for North Antrim was removed by hon. Gentlemen opposite. We made a compact with the hon. Member for Mid Cork to withdraw his block, hearing that, in that case, the hon. Member for North Antrim would remove his block also. But we were not informed—and I trust the Chairman of Ways and Means will see that this is a substantial matter—we were not informed that any terms whatever had been made with the hon. Member for North Antrim as to the withdrawal of his block. We knew nothing whatever of the fact that part of the understanding upon which the block was to be withdrawn was that the provisions of the Bill were to apply to one borough only. If I had known of that proposal I would have put down a block in my own name, because I strongly protest against the Bill being allowed to proceed on the understanding that it is to apply to one borough only. If that understanding was made part of the bargain, the withdrawal of the block on this side of the House was obtained under false pretences. Surely we have as much claim to fair treatment in private matters as we have in our public capacity, and we were entitled to be made acquainted with any private understanding which had been arrived at between the two hon. Baronets—the Member for Mid Armagh and the Member for North Antrim. I now see the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in his place for the first time this evening, and I hope it has not distressed him to come down at this early hour. I have been pointing out that neither the right hon. Gentleman, nor the Attorney General for Ireland, nor the Under Secretary was in his place when we allowed the Municipal Franchise Bill of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh to go into Committee, on the distinct understanding that it was to apply to the whole of Ireland. That understanding has now been broken. And now let me say a word upon the question of convenience. I know that any argument as to inconvenience and wasting the time of the House has much weight with right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Should the Motion of my hon. Friend for the postponement of this Bill be defeated there must be a long discussion, which will probably occupy the whole of the evening, upon the question of the action of the House of Lords in knocking the Franchise Clause out of the Drainage Bill. A long debate on the merits of the Bill and on the excision of the Franchise Clause will probably waste the entire night. On the other hand, if the Government assent to the Motion for adjourning the debate, and will give us an opportunity of placing the whole of the boroughs of Ireland on the same principle of equality which is extended to the boroughs of England and Scotland, there will be no difficulty in passing the Main Drainage Bill. I am glad to see the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) in his place, and I hope we shall not only have his support, but that of the noble Marquess the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington)—the real Government in Office. Are they going to say that a municipal franchise which has existed in England and Scotland for 25 years is not to be applied to the corporate towns of Ireland? We are told that the Bill will not pass if it is allowed to remain intact. At present it is a Bill which is to be applied to the whole of Ireland; but it is proposed to restrict it to Belfast alone. Let the House of Lords restrict it to Belfast alone if they like to take that responsibility into their hands. I would appeal to the right hon. Member for West Birmingham whether he desires to see the extension of the municipal franchise in Ireland restricted to the town of Belfast? There are wards in Limerick in which the municipal voters are so few that there cannot be a contest. It takes 20 voters to justify a contest, and in one of the wards in Limerick there are only 18. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to support a restricted franchise of that nature? In Waterford there are no rates levied, because there is plenty of municipal property; but there are not more than 100 voters in the entire municipal borough. Are we, with our eyes open, to allow these restricted franchises to exist? Is it not a duty to our constituents to protest against them, and make the Franchise Bill general, leaving the House of Lords, if they like, to restrict its application to the borough of Belfast? We ought not to allow a Municipal Bill dealing with the whole of Ireland to be shrunk into such miserable dimensions that it will apply to Belfast alone. The hon. Member for East Belfast (Mr. De Cobain) said that there is no demand for it in the rest of Ireland. It may be said that there was no demand for it in Belfast until my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) came forward to oppose the restriction. The entire credit is due to my hon. Friend for all that has been done since. When the rest of the people of Ireland see that the Bill has passed a second reading and got into Committee, and that they have the haven within sight, will they be content to see the franchise restricted to one borough? I am afraid we are asked to do a thing which will be scouted by our constituents. Seeing that the Government opposite is not a Tory Government, but a Unionist Government, and that the House has assented on half-a-dozen previous occasions to the principle of extending to Ireland the provisions relating to the municipal franchise which now exist in England and Scotland, I ask the Government to see that a way shall be found out of this holdfast, and that the provisions of the Bill shall not be restricted to Belfast alone. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork would certainly never have taken off his block if he could have known that such an understanding had been arrived at.

SIR JAMES CORRY (Armagh, Mid): I can afford to pass by the references which have been made to myself by the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy). But having the charge of the Municipal Franchise Bill I think it right to say how the matter stands. Immediately after the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means, I endeavoured to put myself in communication with the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), and I told him that I found it entirely impossible to proceed with the Bill as it stood, but that if it was confined to Belfast I had no doubt that it would pass. He said that it was impossible for him at that time to give me any reply to the question, but that he would consult the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner), and would let me know later on what course it would be possible to take. A few days afterwards the hon. Member informed me that he had mentioned the matter to some Members of his Party, and that some were in favour of the proposal, while others were not. As far as he was concerned, he was prepared, when the Bill came before the House, to support its restriction to Belfast.

MR. SEXTON: Will the hon. Baronet allow me to say a word in explanation? What I said was that, even if the Bill was passed in its restricted form, I should no further oppose the Main Drainage Bill.

SIR JAMES CORRY: I understood the hon. Member to say that if the Bill was proceeded with, and restricted to Belfast, he would not oppose it, but would do the best he could to induce other hon. Members of the Party to which he belongs to accept it. To my knowledge, there have been considerable differences of opinion among the Nationalists already in reference to this Bill. When I found that a block had been attached to it by my hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Sir Charles Lewis) I spoke to him upon the matter, and arranged that it should be taken off, on the understanding, however, that the provisions of the Bill should be limited to Belfast. The result was that, on the second reading, I explained to the House my intention to move ultimately that the Bill should be restricted to Belfast. I did that in perfect good faith, because the clause which the hon. Member for West Belfast had introduced into the Drainage Bill in this House, and which was struck out in the House of Lords, only applied to Belfast; and I was very anxious that, as far as I was concerned, I should endeavour to carry out the understanding with the hon. Member for West Belfast, and secure the passing of the Municipal Franchise Bill. The clause which the hon. Member for West Belfast had introduced into the Drainage Bill was entirely contrary to all precedent. There is no precedent whatever, as far as I know, for the introduction of a Franchise Clause into a Bill of that kind. When the Bill had been read a second time I named Monday last for the Committee; but the hon. and learned Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) asked me to name Tuesday, which I did. On Tuesday the hon. Member for West Belfast asked me to postpone the Committee stage still further until Thursday, so that he might be able to communicate with his friends. I was, therefore, much astonished this morning, when the Bill came on, to find the hon. and learned Member for North Longford declaring that he was prepared to reject a Bill which restricted the franchise to Belfast, and that he would only support a Bill for the whole of Ireland. I had no opportunity of consulting the members of the Corporation of Belfast on the subject; but I had undoubtedly understood that hon. Members belonging to the Nationalist Party below the Gangway were prepared to accept the restriction of the measure to Belfast. I certainly fell in with that view; but I cannot consent to the further postponement of the present Bill, seeing that the question of the main drainage is one of the most urgent importance. It is an entire mistake to say that the majority of the people of Belfast are opposed to this scheme; and I think I ought to know, from my long residence in Belfast, the views of the people of that town quite as well as the hon. Member for East Belfast (Mr. De Cobain). I say, unhesitatingly, that this is a Bill approved of by everybody who knows anything of the requirements of the town, and who have any stake in the prosperity of Belfast, and who are anxious to see that prosperity going on with increased vigour. The hon. Member for East Belfast says that if the Bill were postponed, or even if the Bill were rejected, the corporate funds of the borough are quite sufficient for the purpose of carrying out a scheme of main drainage. I quite understand the suggestion which he makes, and that is that the profits of the Gas Works, which belong to the town, should be applied to this purpose. His suggestion would not only relieve the owners of small property from taxation, but it would simply remove the burden from one class to another. As a matter of fact, I have heard many of the opponents of the Bill state at various deputations that they are not opposed to the main drainage scheme, and that it is only because they have been disappointed in not getting what they want that they now oppose it. The fact is that the main drainage scheme is one which is very much required, and it would be a very great mistake if it were further postponed. I shall certainly oppose the Motion which the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Conway) has made, unless there is an agreement that the Franchise Bill, which I have had the honour to bring in, shall be restricted to Belfast alone. If such an agreement were arrived at, I should have no objection to postpone this Bill until the 20th of June.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I really should like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary what is in the mind of the Government with reference to the Franchise Question. It is scarcely fair to the House to leave it in the dark as to the purpose of the Government in reference to the Franchise Bill, and the Government must be aware that whether they were going to accept the limited proposal of the hon. Baronet or the Bill in its entirety goes to the root of the matter. If the Government will tell us what line they are going to take in reference to the Bill, it will probably have the effect of throwing the responsibility on hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway as to the course which may be pursued. I would therefore press on the right hon. Gentleman to tell us, as shortly as he likes, but quite distinctly, what course he and his Colleagues are going to take.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): It appears to me that we are now considering the Main Drainage Bill, and not the merits of the Franchise Bill. It is quite clear that whether it be right or wrong to test the merits of a local scheme of drainage by the question of an extension of the municipal franchise, the connection is an unnatural one which ought no longer to be allowed to exist, and if we cannot come to some agreement to-night, the opinion of the House ought to be taken upon the Drainage Bill by itself. The right hon. Gentleman opposite asks me what course the Government intend to take in regard to the Franchise Bill. I do not think that I am at this moment called upon to express any judgment with regard to the abstract merits or demerits of a scheme for extending the municipal franchise in every borough in Ireland. The present occasion is one on which such a measure could not be carried through, and I should not support but oppose it upon a Bill of this character, without expressing any views on the general question. Everything connected with this Bill has been singular and anomalous, and I hope that the precedent will never be followed again. If we look at the question of the municipal franchise on its merits it does appear to me that it may be discussed on the Bill, limited in its scope, which has been framed by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry). If the Committee, whose duty it is to deal with the Bill, will accept the limited scope of the measure, confining its operation to the City of Belfast, the Government will be happy to give any assistance they can. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Why?] For reasons which I have laid before the House already. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has asked me what the policy of the Government is? I hope I have explained the position of the Government. If I were to state more fully the motives which influence them, I should probably be ruled out of Order.

I have, however, explained the course the Government are prepared to take in the matter, and I would ask the House if an arrangement cannot be come to by which the Franchise Bill may be limited to Belfast, at all events to finally announce whether this Drainage Bill is to be passed or not, and bring to an end this melancholy contest upon which we have already wasted so much time.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (Londonderry City): I believe it is an entire mistake on the part of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant to say that this is the only instance of the tacking on a Franchise Clause to a Private Bill. I believe that it has been done over and over again. To come to the question more immediately before the House, I believe we are reduced to this position—shall we accept or shall we not accept the suggestion made by the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means. Now, as far as I am concerned, I regret, as most of my hon. Friends do, the attempt to strike out of the Municipal Franchise Bill all reference to any place except the borough of Belfast. I will go further, and say that I regret very much that any arrangement has been made which seems to support and sanction a proceeding of that kind on this side of the House. Everyone who will go back into the history of this measure will see perfectly well that it is a measure the principle of which has again and again been affirmed upon this side of the House. The hon. Member for East Belfast (Mr. De Cobain) and some other hon. Members seem to think that Belfast is a city peculiarly wanting this increased and improved franchise, and which has expressed a special desire to obtain it. I assure him that upon that matter he is entirely mistaken. Belfast has, no doubt, had peculiar opportunities for pressing her wishes upon the House in a decisive manner. But I assure him that in the City of Derry, which I represent, there is quite as great a need for an extended franchise. I say with confidence that a great dissatisfaction is expressed there against the present franchise, and that there is as strong and popular a desire for a better state of things as prevails even in Belfast or in any other borough in Ireland. Still we have now brought down the question to a narrow issue—namely, whether we ought to accept the proposal of the Chairman of Ways and Means or not. Speaking now only for myself, I am willing to accept that proposal. I think that, at any rate, we should gain something for Belfast, and that we shall gain nothing, even for Belfast, if we reject it. Therefore, I cannot take on myself the responsibility of rejecting the proposition; and, as far as I am concerned, I shall offer no further opposition to the progress of the Franchise Bill.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'on Monday 20th June,' be there added," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Consideration of Lords Amendments deferred till Monday 20th June.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): By way of personal explanation, I wish to say that, although I do not oppose the Lords' Amendments, I wish it to be clearly understood that I do not consider myself in the least bound not to oppose the Franchise Bill in its restricted form.

GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY (re-committed) BILL (by Order).

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I wish to explain that it is proposed in the Bill to give certain market rights to the Great Eastern Railway Company. The Company already possess certain markets in crowded localities in the East End of London, but they have held them without any market rights, and it is proposed in this Bill to give them certain market rights and legal authority for holding these markets. When the Bill was before the House on a former occasion, I considered it my duty to ask the House to refer it back to the Committee to consider whether or not some provision should not be inserted which would deprive the Company of any vested interests. A clause was inserted which it was thought would carry out that intention; but I do not think the clause is quite clear on the subject, and

Mr. Justin M. Carthy

I now have to propose that the clause be omitted, with a view to inserting another clause providing that on any market authority starting a market in the neighbourhood, they may be able to call upon the Great Eastern Railway Company to close their market without compensation. By that means the market rights of the Company cannot by any possibility come into conflict with any power which may be exercised by a Local Authority. That is the short history of the clause which I now ask the House to read a second time. I beg to move, after Clause 61, to insert the following clause:—

"In the event of any public authority exercising the powers of a market authority for any district or borough in which the Bishopsgate Market or the Stratford Market is situated, and providing adequate market accommodation for such district or borough, such authority may give notice in writing to the Company that such accommodation has been provided; and, at the expiration of three months from the date of such notice, or from the date of the order hereinafter referred to of the Local Government Board certifying that adequate market accommodation within the meaning of this section has been provided by the public authority, the market rights and powers by this Act vested in the Company shall cease and determine as regards the Bishopsgate Market or the Stratford Market, as the case may be, and no compensation shall be payable to the Company in respect of the determination of such rights and powers.

Provided, That, if the Company or if any person interested shall, within one month from the giving to the Company of such notice as aforesaid, represent in writing to the Local Government Board that adequate market accommodation within the meaning of this section has not been provided by the public authority, the question of the adequacy or inadequacy of such accommodation shall be determined by the Local Government Board, who shall by order certify whether or not adequate market accommodation within the meaning of this section has been provided by the public authority, and any such order shall be conclusive as to the fact.

Provided also, That, when the market rights and powers by this Act vested in the Company have ceased and determined as regards either the Bishopsgate Market or the Stratford Market, the Company may retain the site of such market as part of their Railway undertaking.

The Local Government Board may direct any inquiries to be held by their inspectors which they may deem necessary for the purposes of this section, and the inspectors of the Local Government Board shall, for the purposes of any such inquiry, have all such powers as they have for the purposes of inquiries directed by that Board under 'The Public Health Act, 1875.'

Any expenses incurred by the Local Government Board in relation to any inquiries under this section, including the expenses of any witnesses summoned by the inspector holding the inquiry, and a sum to be fixed by that Board, not exceeding three guineas a day, for the services of such inspector shall be paid to that Board by the market authority or the Company, as the Local Government Board may by order determine."

New Clause—

(In the event of adequate market accommodation being provided by public authorities, Company's market rights under this Act to cease without entitling them to compensation, &c.)—(Mr. Ritchie.)— —brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I do not object to the insertion of this clause. The points to which I desire to draw the attention of the House will, I think, be more fittingly raised upon the Amendments which stand on the Paper in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for South-East Essex (Major Rasch). With that reservation, I offer no opposition to the clause.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I believe that this clause will be useless, because there are several clauses of the Bill which the House will be asked to reject on account of the variety of interests involved in them. Therefore, if we accept the clause for the moment, I hope it will be thoroughly understood that we are not to be precluded from offering opposition to other clauses.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): I beg to move the omission from the Preamble of paragraphs 1 and 2. I have to apologize to the House, especially at this late hour, and to ask them to give me a patient hearing upon this subject. It is a one to which I have given some four or five years of very close study and even of practical work, and although this Bill appears before the House as a Private Bill it is a measure which introduces questions which relate to public policy, and which are altogether unprecedented in our legislation. This House, Sir, is asked to commit itself to a provision which will give into the hands of a Railway Company an enormous extension of a monopoly which they at present enjoy. It is asked to give them a monopoly over something, which I submit is the last thing in the world in regard to which a monopoly should be exercised, and that is, the food of this Metropolis. That is the real question at issue. In a Paper which has been distributed by the Great Eastern Railway Company to the Members of this House, this morning, I see it stated that the opponents of the Bill are monopolists, who wish to retain monopolies in their own hands. As far as I am personally concerned, everything that I have done in regard to this market question in London has been directed towards breaking down the monopoly which now exists in regard to the food supply, and in getting rid of the ring in connection with which every question of the food supply has been tied up. I am well aware of the difficulties I shall have to encounter in opposing a powerful Railway Company—a Railway Company which has four of its Directors Members of this House, all of them sitting on this side of the House. That is one of the difficulties I have to contend with, and I am also aware of the difficulty of attempting to upset the decision of the Select Committee of this House. At the same time, I maintain that this is a new departure in the spirit and policy of our legislation in regard to railways; and, therefore, I wish to take the question out of the hands of the Committee of four Members and out of the hands of the Directors of the Great Eastern Railway Company, and to submit it to the general judgment of the House, and of those who are unwilling to consent that any act of public policy should be passed in this House within the covers of a Private Bill without having first received the full sanction of the House. Perhaps I may be allowed to explain that the opposition which is raised to this part of the Bill will not inconvenience the Great Eastern Railway Company with regard to the Bill generally. The Bill itself is an Omnibus Bill, and my opposition is confined to the market clauses which are contained within it. I wish, also, to impress upon the attention of the House, that our opposition to these clauses of the measure will not endanger or effect the continuation of Stratford Market. I am prepared to admit that Stratford Market at the present moment is doing a useful work; but the Great Eastern Railway Company have carried on Stratford Market for eight years without attempting to apply for Parliamentary sanction; they are carrying it on now with the utmost perseverance, and the only person who opposes them is the lessee of Spitalfields Market. The agreement with him under which they carry on the market holds good until the year 1888, and by that time the whole question of the markets, which has been referred to a Royal Commission, may be expected to be settled, and if it should so happen that it is not settled there would be no difficulty in obtaining a temporary renewal of the agreement. Therefore, the opposition to these clauses can have nothing to do with endangering the existence of the existing market at Stratford. That is a mere bogey raised up in order to secure the passing of the Bill. My two main points, Sir, are that these Market Clauses are contrary to the spirit and practice of our railway legislation, and that they are injurious and threatening to the public interest. Sir, I contend that there is no precedent for granting a market authority to a Railway Company. It would have the effect of converting them into traders, because although they do not themselves sell the goods, they have full control over the traders who do sell the goods, and in that way they have the practical, if indirect, management of the trading. Parliament, I am aware, has granted the ownership of steamboats and of hotels to Railway Companies, but there is no parallel between those cases and this, seeing that the former are merely a physical continuation of the proper business of a Railway Company as carriers, and the latter are necessary for the accommodation of the passengers carried by rail; and, at the same time, it must be borne in mind that Railway Companies have no control over the passengers they carry or over the conveyance of the goods. The Great Northern Railway Company at the present moment have a dépôt at King's Cross for the sale of potatoes; but they have no market authority, and have never applied for one. Indeed, a few years ago they attempted to open a market there, but were stopped by injunction. In 1883 the Great Eastern Railway Company obtained the right of opening shops in the Bishopsgate Dépôt; but that is a totally different thing from a market franchise, because in a market the general public have a right, whereas in a shop they have no right at all. It is in this aspect of the case I submit to the House the necessity of opposing the granting to a Railway Company of the complete control over a market where the public should have rights, but where a Railway Company has an interest altogether opposed to that of the public—namely, the private interest of its traffic rate. This has been recognised in the case of Bradford, where there is a railway market, i.e., a market with the rails running into it; but the market itself is in the hands of the Corporation, which is right and proper, for it is thereby secured that it is worked in the interests of the market, i.e., in the interests of the public, and not in the interests of the Railway. I wish to lay stress on the point that a railway market is a very different thing from a market in the hands of a Railway. I ask the House to listen for a moment to the methods by which a Railway Company can exercise these powers if Parliament choose to confer market powers upon them. One principle ought to underlie the granting of every market franchise, and that is that it is to be for the public interest. Now, Sir, let us go a step further. In order that the public interest should be preserved, it is of the essence of a market that it should be free. By free, I do not mean free from tolls and charges, although on this point I think nothing more than the mere cost of maintaining the market should be taxed upon the food in the shape of tolls. By free, I mean that there should be perfect equality, and that there should be no differential tolls and charges, but that there should be perfect freedom of access to the market, and that the consignees, who are tenants within the market, should be free to bring their goods from whatever source they please, and by whatever means of communication they please, so that there should be within the market a perfect competition of produce from all sources, and a perfect competition of the charges or cost of bringing the produce by road or by rail, and if by rail, by different lines of rail, into the market. How will these conditions, which are the necessary basis of a public market, be affected by a market in the hands of a Railway Company? The first interest of a Railway Company is its traffic rate. In the first place, the market authority, if the Railway Company is the market authority, will prefer rail-borne produce to road-borne produce. They will get nothing out of the road-borne produce, and will direct their whole attention to the rail-borne produce. In support of this argument, I may mention the fact that hitherto, in Stratford Market, the delicate and perishable garden produce which is brought there has been invariably left out in the open space, while the whole of the covered spaces have been monopolized for rail-borne traffic. This treatment is destructive of the industry of the market gardeners around London who bring fresh vegetables into London. Compare with this the treatment which the same produce receives in Covent Garden Market, where there is no railway interest to serve. In the case of Covent Garden, the market-garden produce is placed under cover, and the heavy rail-borne produce is put in the open spaces. There is a second thing that a Railway Company, if it becomes a market authority, must do—it must secure that all goods conveyed to the market are conveyed upon its own line. Now the Great Eastern Railway Company are great carriers of vegetable produce from the Eastern Counties; but, in those counties, many of the most important districts with which the Great Eastern Railway have a connection are common also to the Great Northern Railway. Then is it to be supposed for a moment that the Great Eastern Railway, having the power they possess over their tenants, will not say to their tenants—"You must send all your produce over the Great Eastern Railway;" and the result will be that the competition of rates, which is the only safeguard the public have, will be completely destroyed. There is a third thing a Railway Company must do. It will invariably give the preference to big consignors over small consignors, and it is easy to see why. It gets more out of them; they are saved trouble; and there can be no doubt that the small landholder whom we wish to encourage will, under such an arrangement, certainly go to the wall. Then, fourthly, it is only natural to conclude that the Railway Company will incessantly work for the 'long lead,' i.e., they will prefer to obtain the produce for the markets they are serving from the greatest possible distance, and the result of that will be that growers within 30 or 40 miles of London will be placed at a disadvantage. The Railway Company will take very little trouble in regard to consignors in the immediate neighbourhood of the market itself, their principal object being to obtain the extra remuneration they will get for the carriage of goods over long stretches of their own railway. Now, Sir, I have by no means exhausted the subject, but I have shown four definite ways by which a Railway Company, if converted into a market authority, will interfere with the freedom of access, and the fair and full competition which must form the basis of a real public market. I am afraid that I have entered at too great length upon this part of the subject, and have left myself little time to point out the unreasonableness of this question being raised at a moment when the whole matter is under the consideration of a Royal Commission, which the House has granted at the instance of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), and which if it means anything at all, means this—that all markets are to be in the hands of popularly elected representative local authorities. The President of the Local Government Board has inserted a clause which absolutely nullifies this principle, for this Railway is to be allowed to keep these markets open, and in its own hands, until the Local Authorities shall have provided ample market accommodation. But so far as the Bishopsgate district is concerned, they never can do this. It would cost the ratepayers an enormous sum. Therefore if they wait till that day, as the clause compels them to do, Bishopsgate Market will remain for ever in the hands of the railway. Why this tender interest, this marked exception for a Railway Company? Let me remind the House that a Railway Company necessarily has enormous power over their tenants—tenants, whose rents they can raise any day from the £15 actually paid, to the £50 they take care to put in the agreement—monthly tenants whom they are able to turn out at almost a moment's notice if they do not get their goods by rail instead of road, by the Great Eastern rail instead of any other, from big consignors instead of small, from distant sources instead of nearer ones. I am quite aware that there has been introduced into this Bill what is called a Protective Clause ; but I maintain that that Protective Clause is purely illusory. After the word "equality" come the words "so far as circumstances will allow." I say that those are very suspicious words, especially when they are left in the hands of a Railway Company. They leave a very wide margin indeed for the Railway Company to experiment upon, and it cannot be supposed that in their treatment of their tenants they will sacrifice their own interests for those of the public. Now, I say that, on all these points, and especially in regard to the question of road-borne and rail-borne produce, there is absolutely no protection whatever in this Bill for the public, and no protection for the market tenants. I maintain that it is unwise and unsafe to alter the policy which Parliament has for so many years adopted in regard to Railway Companies, and to place the powers of a market authority in their hands. I maintain, further, that if you grant the powers now asked for, you will create a monopoly, you will destroy the present road-borne produce, and you will leave the market at the mercy of a Railway Company, whose previous record, with regard to all questions of traffic and their treatment of the public, is certainly most unsatisfactory, and is certainly not such as to justify the House of Commons in extending a monopoly. I thank the House for having granted its indulgence to me, and for having listened to my remarks so patiently. In conclusion, I have only to add one word, which is of a personal nature. It may be said that I have a personal interest in the question, as opposed to the Great Eastern Railway. Well, Sir, it is quite true that it has devolved upon me to be the owner of a market at the East End of London, which, for some years, I have been endeavouring, under great difficulties, to maintain, in pursuance of the noble objects with which it was built, to afford some relief to the congested state of the food supply of London, especially in the poorest districts. I am ready to admit that that enterprise has not been so successful as its promoters desired ; but I claim for it that it has done this—that it has been a standing menace to rings and monopolists, and has very much mitigated their evil action ; because those who exercise the power of these rings and monopolies know that if they oppress their victims too much, in the end they will resort to another market where they have no power. With regard to the question of my own personal interest, which may be flung in my face, I may say that the market which is now in my possession was opened without the slightest hope of a return for the capital expended upon it, and while I ask the pardon of the House for entering into a personal matter, I do not hesitate to claim that what I have spoken on this occasion has been dictated by the same motives that have dictated my previous action in the matter of the food supply of London—viz., the public interest. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name, and which I may explain refers solely to Bishopsgate Market, a new market which the Great Eastern Railway Company seek to establish within 200 or 300 yards of two other markets, which are ample for the purposes of the locality.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) : I will detain the House as shortly as I possibly can in putting before it the points which have induced me to decide in favour of the Amendment, although I frankly say that my objection applies both to Bishopsgate and Stratford Markets, and the whole of the clauses which affect them. I think that the Railway Company are ill-advised, considering the beneficial Amendments which were made in the Bill when it was first brought before the House, in insisting upon the Toll Schedules at all ; because if they did not claim the right of levying tolls on produce, the opposition which is being offered to the Bill would have been to a great extent disarmed. It is unfortunate that while the House has just decided to appoint a Royal Commission for the purpose of investigating the whole question, and the opinion has been expressed with unanimity by the House that all tolls shall be in the hands of market authorities; that even for a limited time new market toll rights should be granted by Statute by this House. I would suggest that the Great Eastern Railway Company should make their profits in a proper way—namely, as common carriers, and not as market keepers. There are many disadvantages connected with the course taken by the Great Eastern Railway Company, and a special disadvantage arises in this case—namely, that the tolls have in the past been of an exorbitant character—that they have been imposed under a Charter which dates back for some centuries. The railway have now very properly thrown over the Charter owners—at least, as far as this Bill is concerned—but I do not know whether the Company have any private agreement. If they have, they have been keeping it to themselves; and I trust that the House will not permit them to derive a toll profit at all. Unless there is a distinct statement from the promoters of the Bill as to these tolls, I trust that the division may be made a test question on the whole of these Market Clauses, and that the House will reject them. There is another difficulty, how to meet which is not clear in my mind. It is a difficulty which I have raised in the House before. In a statement circulated among Members to-day, the Great Eastern Railway Company express a desire to encourage the enterprise of the occupiers of small farms and the small growers of garden produce. If that is their intention, they give no evidence of it in this Bill. This Bill gives them powers which Railway Companies generally exercise in order to obtain the tonnage which pays them best on conditions which suit them most, and it will suit them most to maintain a large and a regular through traffic with through rates, and if possible, preferential rates to foreign growers at the expense of the home growers, which is acting directly in the teeth of the decision of the House the other day. I understand that the object of the House in that decision was to restrict, as far as possible, the action of the middleman between the grower and the market. It is impossible to suppose that a Railway Company will afford facilities to small growers unless there is something to impose that obligation upon them. Their disposition is to take from the middleman large quantities of produce, which are easily received, and convey them for long distances, and in that way to handicap the smaller growers, whom it is the object of the House to encourage. There is a difficulty which I do not understand, unless it arises from some desire to consult the interest of the Charter owners. By Clause 63 of the Bill it is provided that road and rail traffic shall, as far as Stratford Market is concerned, be treated on an equality; but there is no provision for the admission of road produce to Bishopsgate at all, so that if the House passes this Bill, it will drive the unfortunate growers who are near London entirely into the hands of the Charter owner, whose rights are about to be inquired into, and against all these Charter rights the House expressed a strong opinion upon the Motion which I moved. I do not think it would be decent on my part to occupy the time of the House any further on a Private Bill; but I do ask the House not to consent to give to this Railway Company a statutory right to levy tolls which cannot be necessary for them. Their profits ought to be made out of the ordinary work which Railway Companies undertake to perform as common carriers. Although it is perfectly true, and I thank the Government for it, that we have a clause by which, when Local Authority takes over this market, there is to be no claim for compensation. I regret very much that these Market Clauses should appear in the Bill at all. I think we ought also to feel indebted to the Committee and the Chairman of the Committee for the efforts they have made to look after the interests of the home growers, seeing that it is so much to the interest of the Railway Company to carry large quantities for the middlemen rather than small quantities for the producer who consigns them straight to the consumer. I entreat the House not to give to this Railway Company the large powers which they now seek.

Mr. HANBURY (Preston): Although the Amendment of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Burdett-Coutts) only refers to one market—namely, that at Bishopsgate, practically this discussion will deal with them as the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) has suggested. I admit at once that the question which the hon. Member has raised, as to tolls, is a very important one indeed. The principle on which the Committee went was that the tolls levied at these markets should be lower than any other tolls at any other market in London. I think that that was safeguarding the rights of the public to a very considerable extent.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Did the Committee have any evidence that the tolls are lower?

MR. HANBURY: Yes; there was a good deal of evidence to that effect, and I believe that the Great Eastern Railway Company are willing that the tolls levied in these markets should be lower than those levied in any other market in London. As to foreign produce, I sympathize thoroughly with the remarks of the hon. Member with respect to preferential rates for foreign produce; but, unfortunately, it was a question of rates with which the Committee have no power to deal in a Bill of this sort. The same remark applies to the encouragement of the small producers. Unfortunately their case also was not one for the Committee to deal with; but I should have thought that there were sufficient powers in the hands of the Railway Commissioners to see that the small producers are put on the same footing as the large. Then, as to the road-borne traffic, there again the hon. Member has raised what at first sight may seem to be a grievance; but Bishopsgate Market is in a peculiar position. In the first place, there are two road-borne markets within 400 yards of it on each side, and therefore there is not the same necessity for a road-borne market as there is for a rail-borne market. On the other hand, the Committee were most anxious, if it could be established, to see a fair road-borne market; but in regard to Bishopsgate Market we found, that although a large market itself, the purchasers are small purchasers, and that it is impossible to constitute it both a rail-borne and a road-borne market at the same time. There were some other reasons why it was not constituted a road-borne market. I would ask the hon. Member for Northampton to recollect that while we had to consider the interests of the public, we had also to fight the monopolists of the markets at the present moment. The hon. Member for Westminster, in the beginning of his speech, said he was afraid that the Bill was practically introducing the new principle of allowing a Railway Company to hold a market. The hon. Gentleman got a Bill passed through this House making him the owner of a railroad also.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: I am sure the hon. Member would not wish to misrepresent me. I got no Bill to make myself the owner of a railway anywhere. The Bill I got was one to make myself the owner of tram lines, and put myself in communication with the railway; but the whole point of my enterprise was that it was to put me in communication with all the railroads of England, and therefore secure perfect competition of rates and charges to the market—a very different thing from one big railway line controlling a market.

MR. HANBURY: It was something more than a tramway, for it was in actual connection with the line, and the trains of the North-Western Railway ran over it. We have been told over and over again that there is not a single line which runs into his market which cannot also run into this market at Bishopsgate. We talk as if it were a new proposal to open a market at Bishopsgate at all; but, as a matter of fact, in 1883 Parliament allowed a market for fish and meat to be established at Bishopsgate, but it was not allowed to be a market for vegetables, and for this reason—it was because there was a very great monopoly at Spitalfields Market, where the owner of the market was enabled, under an old Charter of King James II., when the population of London was a hundred fold less than it is now, to prevent anybody, within six miles, from selling any vegetables at all. That was a monstrous monopoly; but it existed. You have the fact that the Committee having broken down that monopoly there is no disposition that Stratford Market should be discontinued. Not a man came before the Committee to say he wanted the market discontinued. But what was the whole argument of those who opposed the continuance of the market at Bishopsgate? Why that Stratford Market had been going on for the last seven years, and was under no Parliamentary powers, and therefore was illegal, and the salesmen at Stratford, and the West Ham Corporation, if the Great Eastern authorities did not do their bidding exactly, and carry on the market as they wanted, could come against them with an injunction and say—"We will shut up your market altogether." Here, then, you have the fact that they wish this market to be continued, and the only opposition to our powers is on the part of those men who wish to have entirely the whip hands of the Great Eastern Railway Company. I do not believe Parliament would wish that the Railway Company should be put any longer in this position of having a market which anybody could close at once by an injunction. It is much more straightforward and honest to come before this House, and frankly ask to have market powers given to them. Then, I say, if they are entitled to have a market at Bishopsgate for fish and meat, how much more necessary is it to have a market for vegetables, for what is the condition of things at present?

Mr. Hanbury

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: The Great Eastern have no market rights at all, and never had. They simply have a power to open shops.

MR. HANBURY: Take the poor of the East End; they are dependent almost entirely for vegetables on those which are brought by road. Well, we know how the area of London is extending; how great districts, like South Kensington for instance, are now completely transformed by buildings. It is all the more necessary that London should be supplied with vegetables from a great distance. A great deal of the opposition springs from those who bring road-borne produce to market; but it is for the interests of the public that they should have good, sound, healthy vegetables brought for them by rail. But that cannot be done at present, because there are no markets at the railway stations, and the vegetables are much damaged by being transferred from the railway trucks to the ordinary markets. Therefore, I believe the Railway Company are doing good to the public and to the poor by this proposal, which would enable them to get their vegetables without all this friction and transference. Then, I ask, is this a time, when the agricultural districts are suffering so severely, when the farmers do not know which way to turn in order to make both ends meet, to refuse what is asked? Surely it would be well for the farmers, and those who depend upon them, that markets should be open to them in London, so that they might send their produce there. Mr. Clare Sewell Read, who is a great authority on such a subject, said, when he was examined before the Committee, that it was a matter of life or death to the farmers of Norfolk and Suffolk that they should have a market to send to. As to the Local Authorities, and their right to establish markets, the Bill was opposed by the Local Authorities, who thought that if they had powers for markets of their own, it would be better. But the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) has settled that matter by providing that there shall be no interference with the powers of the Local Authorities—that if the Bill is passed, the Local Authorities shall not have to fight the battle over again with the monopolists, and that it will be easier for them, and a positive advantage to them, that the Bill should have been passed. Now, there is one other point to which I wish specially to direct attention, and it arises out of the remarks of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Burdett-Coutts). If he is the owner of a rival market, I do not say that he has not a right to attend to his own private interests in this House; but I do say this—that we must look at Columbia Market and the position it occupies. It was originally carried on on purely philanthropic principles; and, I am sorry to say, that it was about as dead a failure as ever there was in this world. But since the hon. Member for Westminster has come into connection with that market, he has conducted it very wisely indeed on purely commercial principles.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: How?

MR. HANBURY: Well, in the first place, he has power to raise very heavy tolls indeed—tolls very much in excess of anything to be levied under this Bill.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: I beg to say that no tolls of any kind have ever been charged in Columbia Market. The hon. Member began to describe how I am conducting the market at present. What have these old latent powers to do with that?

MR. HANBURY: No, I dare say not; but we have no guarantee that they will not be. The tolls which the hon. Member has power to raise are greater than at any other market in London. Now, I do not wish to trust to anybody's philanthropy. I look at the fact, and the fact is that the tolls which may be levied there are much greater than anything we ask for. Then, again, Columbia Market, magnificent as it is—and I am bound to say that the people and the poor of London owe a vast debt of gratitude to the lady who established it; but, fine as it is, it is small and limited in area, and is not fit for a wholesale market in any sense of the word.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: It has large powers of extension.

MR. HANBURY: I am talking of it as it exists at the present moment. I say it is not fit for a wholesale market as it stands. The hon. Member for Westminster says he is the owner of railway communication. Well, if that is the case, I do not see how he is entitled to oppose another railway which would let into another market as many railroads as are admitted into Columbia Market.

MR. BURDETT - COUTTS: The Great Eastern won't let any other line into their market.

MR. HANBURY: But how far have we met him? We recognize that it would be grossly unfair, after all he has done for Columbia Market, and after he has got powers to establish railway communication, to let the Great Eastern Railway Company come in at once as a rival railway market. It was represented to us very fairly, that if the Great Eastern Railway Company were to establish their market at once it would get a monopoly, and the hon. Member would start under great difficulties. But what did we do? We inserted a clause which provided, that if the hon. Member did use the powers he obtained in 1885, to establish a railway market within a reasonable period, the Great Eastern Railway Company should not start their market until such period, and the two parties should then start on absolutely fair terms. We could not have done more. I do not think there are any other points which it is necessary for me to enter into; but I do maintain that this is a Bill in the interests of the public, and we certainly want to see the system at work—there can be no doubt whatever about that. I think the objections of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) are very fair and just, and should be provided for in the Bill, and on the third reading, I will give him my support upon them—that is, so far as tolls are concerned, and making them lower than those of any other market in London. Then, I think, this Bill and these markets will be distinctly in the interests of the public. They are in the interests of the Local Authorities who wish to become owners of markets. They are in the interests of the farmers who are served by the Great Eastern Railway. Finally, they are essentially in the interests of the poor of London, who are entitled to have their fresh vegetables where they can get them best and cheapest.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I have listened with great attention to the argument of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury), who has constituted himself the defender of the Railway Company in this House, and I undertake, if necessary, to prove in a very few words the truth of what I say in opposition to his view. Now, I have a right to be heard for a few moments upon this question.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I rise to a point of Procedure, Sir. I claim to move that the Question be now put.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member having made that Motion, I decline to put it.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID: I think the House ought to know what the Railway Company have tried to do for years, and what it is that they propose to do now. Their station at Bishopsgate is within 300 yards of the Spitalfields Market. It is a market which receives a large amount of produce carried by road, and also a large amount carried by the Great Eastern Railway Company; and when the Great Eastern Railway Company tried, on a previous occasion, to start this Bishopsgate Market, we opposed it for the reason that they would have taken away all the railway-borne business which we had formed. The Railway Company fought the question through all the Courts right up to the House of Lords, and the House of Lords decided that they had no right. The Railway Company during the progress of this great suit came to the House of Commons, and asked for the powers at Bishopsgate which the hon. Member the defender of the Railway Company (Mr. Hanbury) has just given. The Railway Company did not get them, and the Committee of that day marked their opinion very strongly by giving costs against the Railway Company. That is a very rare thing to do, and shows the opinion of the then Committee. What has happened since? At Stratford they have carried on their business without having a market of their own, and the owners of Spitalfields have in no way objected; but they have objected when the Company has tried to transfer the business of Spitalfields Market to Bishopsgate. The Railway Company have prevented most of the growers on their line from sending their goods to London, because they have charged such exorbitant rates. They admit that, for they themselves say that they propose to reduce their rates, and undertake to prove that it is owing to the high rates that the produce has not come. All that has come has been sent to Spitalfields Market, and has been sold in fair competition with road-borne produce. What does the Chairman of the Committee want them to do? When this Bill was brought in there were no Tolls Clauses in it at all. The Tolls Clauses were a subsequent idea, invented by the very acute solicitor of the Great Eastern Railway Company. It clearly caused the scheduled agreement to be rejected, and gave the Great Eastern Railway somebody else's property without fair compensation. I will put it to the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) whether it is an honest thing on the part of the Railway Company to transfer most of the business of the Spitalfields Market to the Great Eastern Railway Company without any payment of compensation in face of the fact that the House of Lords, and every other tribunal, have decided that they have no right to do so? I ask that question, and I should like to have an answer to it. When you remember that the Committee have decided to postpone the opening of the market for 18 months there is no hurry, and the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) will probably have his Report before that time. I shall support the Motion of the hon. Member; but I put it to the Members of Her Majesty's Government to say whether in fact it is at all likely that the public will have any greater convenience from the transfer of the business done at Columbia and Spitalfields Markets to the Railway Company. That is the state of the case, and I hope the House will not approve of such a proceeding. I therefore trust the House will not agree to the Bill as it stands.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks on this subject entirely in the interests of my constituents, many of whom are farmers and market gardeners in the Division of South Essex which I have the honour to represent. The House has heard the observation of the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) to the effect that the people of West Ham will be disposed to construct a market of their own, and that will have the effect of extinguishing the market of the Great Eastern Railway Company; but I venture to think it would not do us the least good. We have no influence whatever with the Corporation of West Ham; we cannot oblige them to start a market; and we are entirely in the hands of the Great Eastern Railway Company, as we have been for seven and a-half years. Let me give the House some reasons why we do not wish to be left without a market. As things are at present, we complain of the undue preference of rates and tolls, particularly in the case of what are known as road-borne goods; and I would like to ask hon. Members to look at Clause 63 of the Great Eastern Bill, which states that no undue preference shall be shown to produce borne by rail. I venture to submit that that sentence entirely invalidates the whole clause and makes it a bogus clause. At the end of the clause it is suggested that the decision of a magistrate—if the parties go to law—shall be final. But the magistrate would have no power over the Great Eastern Railway Company, and it is absurd to suppose that the gardeners and small farmers whom I represent would be able to fight a powerful Corporation like the Great Eastern. The reason, Sir, why the Great Eastern Railway Company give preferential rates and charges, and favour railway-borne over road-borne produce is that it pays them better. My constituents are men who have horses and carts, barrows and small trucks, and they would bring their produce if they could. But they are debarred from that, and are almost crushed out of existence. Another reason why the Great Eastern Company should not have a market is that they would be the landlords of the Stratford Market, and the salesmen there would be their three months tenants, and they would use their influence with these salesmen to induce them to bring their produce from districts further away than the suburban districts. The produce from the suburban districts would be kept back. At present the suburban produce which comes at 12 o'clock at night is retained until 6 in the morning till that coming from the Northern Counties of England can also be brought into the market. They charge 10s. a-ton on potatoes going from a distance short of Southend to the Stratford Market, while at the same time they charge only 9s. 2d. per ton on potatoes from Lincolnshire, which is four times as far, and only 5s. a-ton from Southend, which is 10 miles further than the district they charge 10s. from. I do not wish to trouble the House or take up any more time; but I would suggest to hon. Members that the Railway Companies are the worst possible masters of markets, for they use their influence in the interests of their shareholders first, and only secondly in the interests of producers and consumers. I would just allude to the speech of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) the other day, in which he said that the effect would be to increase the price of food and to put land out of cultivation. That is what is being done in my Division. Land is going out of cultivation because these men cannot get a market. If this Bill passes as it stands this House will have increased the price of food, and it will be against the interests of the people of the East End and of the small farmers and labourers. The matter is extremely important to the men whom I am sent here to represent.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON (Liverpool, West Derby): Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I may say a few words in the hope of bringing this discussion to a speedy close. In the first place, I would say a word in reply to the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down (Major Rasch). He says the people of his district are having their land going out of cultivation, and are unable to obtain the means of livelihood owing, in some indirect manner, to the influence of the Stratford Market. The House would gather that that market was a failure, and had not been appreciated by the public, but what are the facts? That market was established in 1879, and opened in 1880, and in the first year 5,100 tons of agricultural produce was brought into the market. The amount of produce had increased last year from 5,100 tons to 25,724 tons, making a total tonnage in six years of 102,493. These facts speak for themselves. It is idle to contend that the market has been a failure in any sense, or that it has not been appreciated by the consumers of the district when I quote these figures to the House. It has been suggested by the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Burdett-Coutts) that we are monopolists. Now, he was very careful to avoid bringing any evidence in support of that allegation. From the very first moment we endeavoured to open these markets we have been fighting tooth and nail against the monopolists of the district. We got powers under the Act of 1883, which in fact established a market at Bishopsgate, and that market would have succeeded if it had not been for the opposition of one of the monopolists in the person of the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Sir Julian Goldsmid). He obtained under his rights an injunction against us as regarded the continuance of that market. We fought our case on behalf of the public in every Court of Law up to the House of Lords, and in every instance the decision was against us, and in favour of the monopolists. They succeeded, and we have had to shut up the market which we had opened in competition with that of which the hon. Member for Westminster is part owner. Now, it has been said that the hon. Baronet the Member for St. Pancras (Sir Julian Goldsmid) is in some respect entitled to compensation. We made an agreement with the hon. Baronet and his co-owner, which agreement we were most anxious to see inserted in the Bill. The Committee declined to insert any such provision; but, at the same time, the Great Eastern Railway Company are perfectly willing that the decision of the Courts of Law should be embodied in the Bill should the House think fit—they are quite willing to insert a clause which would give the hon. Baronet and his co-owner the same tonnage rights they would have possessed according to the original agreement between us as the owners of Bishopsgate Market and themselves as owners of Spitalfields Market, so long as the former situation continues to be used as a market. [Sir JULIAN GOLDSMID: It would not give them to me.] Give them to the lessee of the hon. Baronet. Now, as regards Stratford Market we are in a perfectly different condition. The market rights which it is contended should be exercised at Stratford have never been recognized by any Court of Law, and, therefore, looking to the fact that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) obtained a Royal Commission to inquire into Market Rights, we maintain that any agreement we were willing to have entered into falls to the ground. Now that that agreement has been rejected by the Committee of this House we have nothing further to do with it. The hon. Member for Northampton has very fairly dealt with the various objections he holds with regard to this measure. One is the alleged differential charge between rail and road borne traffic. Now the Bill provides most carefully against any such differential charge in future, should any have been made in the past, and it also appoints a Stipendiary Magistrate, as has been alluded to, as the arbiter in cases of difference, and the hon. Member for West Ham (Mr. Forrest Fulton) proposes, with our consent, to insert in the Bill a clause imposing a penalty upon the Company when the Stipendiary Magistrate should find us guilty of making a differential charge. Further, I will myself give a pledge on behalf of the Company that we will not in any way encourage in the Stratford Market rail as against road-borne traffic, and I hope that assurance will be regarded as sufficient by the hon. Member.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Can that assurance be embodied in the Bill? I quite accept the noble Lord's assurance; but some future Board of Directors might not think themselves bound by it.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON: I quite agree with the hon. Member that we are all mortal; and, therefore, it would be advisable that that assurance should be embodied in the Bill, and I am perfectly willing to consent to its embodiment in the Bill. Well, then, there is the objection as regards the small occupiers. I can assure the hon. Member that, so far as we are concerned, we do not, and never have, favoured large producers as against small producers. Nothing of the kind. We are willing, as common carriers, to bring to market all that comes within our net; it is not our interest, as a Corporation, to do anything which will prejudice the small producers as against large producers. Now, the matter of tolls is a very important one. We cannot consent altogether to give up the tolls which we ask for in this Bill, and for this reason—we have been put to very large capital expense in establishing this market, and we are going to incur still further expense, and there is every day the out-goings consequent upon keeping the market in repair. But I will give this undertaking—that, under all circumstances, the tolls charged by us shall be less than the tolls charged by any other market in London. The tolls charged in Columbia Market are the highest in London, though I quite admit they have not always been exercised.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): I pointed out that they had never been exercised. I cannot help their being in the Act. I cannot take them out. But everything I have done with respect to Columbia Market has been based upon the assumption that no tolls would be charged.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON: I quite admit the intentions of the hon. Member are very good; but, as I observed before, we are all mortal, and that what we may wish to do at the present time, we may be compelled not to do at another time.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Do I understand the noble Lord to say he will also take care that that undertaking is in some formal way recorded in the Bill?

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON: If it can be done. ["Oh, oh!"]

MR. BRADLAUGH: I am afraid that if I am to withdraw my opposition, it must be on the undertaking that some means be found for doing it. Lawyers are very clever, and, I think, will have no difficulty in framing words to cover the undertaking.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON: I put it in this way—if it can be done, it shall be done. I am not a lawyer, and I cannot speak definitely on the point; but I imagine it can be done.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I think I can help your legal advisers in the matter.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON: If the hon. Member will give us the benefit of his assistance, I am sure we shall readily accept it. Now, I think I have answered the main objections to this Bill. The House, I am sure, will understand that we possess no monopoly whatever. The Bill provides that any other market authority may be established next door to us, or opposite to us. We have no right whatever given by this Bill, which prevents another market being set up. We are not monopolists; but we are fighting against monopoly, and I trust that, under these circumstances, the House will assent to the adoption of this Bill.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I will not occupy the House very long. I think that we on this side of the House occupy on this occasion the position of a jury so to speak. We have no prejudice one way or the other; and, therefore, are in a position to give an unbiased opinion. As far as I have been able to make out, a good deal of extraneous matter has been introduced by hon. Members—by the noble Lord (Lord Claud Hamilton), for instance, when he said the exertions of Railway Companies are made on behalf of the public; and also by some of those who preceded him, when they said that they acted on behalf of the consumers. I think neither of these positions can be fairly taken up by Companies in the present day. We must admit that most hon. Members who address the House are, in their remarks, actuated a good deal by their own self-interests, and that we are, as a House, to look upon matters from the point of view of the public interest, or from the point of view of the greatest good. I wish also to say distinctly that, so far as vested rights, upon which the hon. Baronet (Sir Julian Goldsmid) has particularly based his speech, are concerned, vested interests are capable of indefinite extension. Considering that vested rights in this case have not been very clearly put forward, we can scarcely hold that the hon. Baronet has made out a case. The great question involved in this matter is whether or not market rights can safely be entrusted, under the conditions laid down in this Bill, to a Railway Company. With regard to the locality in question, I am distinctly of opinion that the consumers will get no benefit whatever from the establishment of the proposed market. The consumers will have to pay the same, whether they buy in this market, or in the market of the hon. Member (Mr. Burdett-Coutts) who moved the Amendment. The producers will, however, obtain some benefit; and, therefore, I think that upon that ground there is something to be said in favour of the Railway Company. Then, let me regard the matter from another point of view entirely. We have, unfortunately, very large tracts of land in Ireland unsupplied with market accommodation. In the absence of Local Authorities capable of establishing markets, there is no one but Railway Companies to establish markets. There are many railway schemes projected, extending into the far West. It is impossible to carry a line through every village around the coast; but it is quite possible to carry a line to a district central to a large number of villages in the West, which at present are mere places of barter. I shall certainly vote in favour of a Railway Company having the right to establish a market. So far as the debate has gone, the question involved seems to be whether Railway Companies can be trusted with market rights. One Member who opposed this Bill in a very able speech, did so upon the ground that this particular Railway Company was not to be trusted. Now, I understand that this Bill has been considered by and approved by a Committee of this House; and I think that unless a most overwhelming case can be made out, it would be a monstrous thing for us to overturn the decision of our Committee.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an appeal to the House. I think this question has now been completely debated, and that we may well come to a decision upon it. I appeal to the House to come to a decision without further delay.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Perhaps, by the indulgence of the House, I may be permitted to say that I have received most satisfactory assurances on every point which has been raised, and an undertaking to embody these assurances in the Bill when it goes to "another place." Therefore I and my hon. Friends will offer no further opposition to the Bill.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I think it is as well to point out to the First Lord of the Treasury that when nearly three-quarters of an hour ago we moved the closure from these Benches, the right hon. Gentleman made no sign of assenting to it. I, therefore, do not see that he has much cause to complain of the length of the debate.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): As both Bishopsgate and Columbia Markets are situated in my constituency, perhaps, by the kind indulgence of the House, I may, even after the expostulation of the First Lord of the Treasury, say a few words on this question. I want, in the first place, to meet the challenge which was thrown out by the noble Lord (Lord Claud Hamilton). The noble Lord endeavoured to represent the Company with which he is intimately connected as fighting against monopolies, and he challenged us to bring forward a single particle of evidence which would exhibit them in a different character. Sir, I take up the challenge which the noble Lord threw down. As this Bill was originally introduced in the House there was appended to it an agreement between this Company and Mr. Horner, the lessee of Spitalfields Market, and in that agreement there was one clause which particularly struck my attention. It was to this effect—that six of the tenants of Spitalfields Market should always have a prior right of holding in the new market to be established at Bishopsgate. Now, I ask the House whether you could have a provision more admirably adapted to form the nucleus of one of those food-rings from which the population of this Metropolis so grievously suffer? One great objection to the establishment of a market at Bishopsgate consists in this—that land-borne produce is absolutely excluded from the market. I need not enlarge, for other speakers have done so, upon the grievous injury which this provision would inflict upon the small producers whom we are all most anxious to encourage. But I think I may perhaps be permitted to point out what seems to me the greatest inconsistency in the conclusions of the Committee in regard to this matter. So far as the Stratford Market is concerned, they have stipulated, and rightly stipulated, that land-borne produce and rail-borne produce should be treated upon exactly equal terms; but, Sir, what greater inequality can there possibly be than the absolute exclusion of land-borne produce from the Bishopsgate Market. Although I would not say that the Committee have strained at a gnat with regard to Stratford Market, I maintain they have certainly swallowed the camel with regard to Bishopsgate Market. I quite admit that Bishopsgate Market is, by its nature and its surroundings, absolutely disqualified for the admission of land-borne produce, but that seems to me to be a reason, not for disposing of an essential condition, but simply for looking elsewhere for the site for your market. Of all individuals, or Corporations, which might be constituted market authorities, it seems to me that a Railway Company is the worst. Now, it has been said that this is not a favourable and opportune time for coming to this House and asking for new market powers. That is obvious. I do not know that it has been ever impressed upon the House that there is really any occasion for hurry. There is no need why we should come to a decision upon the point at the present time. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) dwelt, and I thought rather irrelevantly, on the argument advanced from this side of the House upon the desirability of extending market accommodation; but the effect of passing this Bill will not be immediately to extend the market accommodation of London. So far as the Stratford Market is concerned, you have had a market open there for eight years, and without Parliamentary powers, and there is no doubt that the market will continue. So far as Bishopsgate Market is concerned, I may point out it is not proposed to give to the Great Eastern Railway Company power to open the market at Bishopsgate at once, but only after the expiration of 18 months from the passing of the Bill. Well, Sir, within 18 months of the passing of the Bill it is probable that we shall have the Report of the Commissioners who have been appointed to consider the whole question of market rights; and I do therefore ask the House to wait until they can decide this question by the light of the information which the Commissioners will give them, and by the aid of the recommendations which the Commissioners will make.

MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.): As I had the honour of serving on the Committee, I am anxious to say a few words with reference to the Motion now before the House. The remark has been made more than once that the proceedings of Committees on Private Bills are always fairly and honourably conducted, inasmuch as politics do not enter into the minds of the Members forming the Committee. Now, Sir, I can bear testimony to the manner in which this Committee discharged its duties. I believe that no two Members of the Committee were perfectly in accord as regards politics; but I am forced to say that we were practically unanimous in the decision we came to. I say practically, Sir, because it was only on one small point that we differed. We devoted something like 21 or 22 days to the consideration of the question; we examined numberless witnesses, and considered the case in all its bearings. We had an opportunity of testing the value of the evidence given us, and we availed ourselves of it more fully, possibly, than is generally done. It has also been said more than once that monopolies should not be allowed to exist. Why, the first consideration of our Committee was to break down monopolies. Two or three monopolies were installed before us, and we at once resolved that anything that lay in our power in the way of breaking down monopolies should be done. We did, Sir, in one case, endeavour to break down a monopoly, and that was the monopoly of Spitalfields Market, the Charter of which was granted, I think, in the reign of James II. I myself put a question to the present lessee of that market. I asked him if a line of carts extended six miles from the market, would he claim to levy toll on all the carts, and his answer was that he certainly should, if the line was unbroken. The House will agree with me that it is monstrous that the lessee of the market should have the right to levy toll over an area of six miles radius. Now, the considerations we took into account were, firstly, the requirements of the poor and increasing population of the East End; secondly, the agricultural interests of the Eastern portion of England—we very anxiously considered the requirements of the local growers around London, particularly in the Eastern Counties, so as to give at least equal and full facilities to the road-borne produce as to the rail-borne produce; thirdly, the facilities of supplying the large and increasing population of the Metropolis; and fourthly, the desirability of reducing the price of food, and the rates of carriage which the Railway Company charge. On all these matters we were thoroughly and fully agreed. I am pleased that the objections raised by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) have been readily met by the promoters of the Bill. Under the circumstances, I think the House will agree with me that the Committee came to the right conclusion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendments made.

Bill to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS.

WAR OFFICE—ARMY ABROAD AND IN INDIA—AUDIT OF ACCOUNTS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is a fact that the accounts of the Army abroad and India are audited every month, while those of the Army at home are only audited half yearly; and, in such case, what is the reason for the distinction; and, if he will consider whether a monthly audit would be advantageous to financial control in the public interest, as well as more satisfactory to the officers of the Army Pay Department?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK) (Surrey, Guildford) (who replied) said: In reply to this Question, I have to say that I am quite of opinion that a monthly audit of accounts is preferable on many grounds; and I am now considering a scheme by which it may be arrived at without causing additional charge against the public.

WAR OFFICE—COMPENSATION TO CERTAIN SENIOR MAJORS.

GENERAL SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will take into consideration the claims for compensation, in some way or other, of those senior Majors in the Army, very few of whom remain, who attained the rank of Captain before the abolition of purchase, and who, owing to the issue of the Royal Warrant of 1st January, 1887, have lost the chance of early promotion, and many of whom will probably have to retire on account of age before attaining the rank of substantive Lieutenant Colonel; and, whether it is the fact that those few officers who consequently do not attain the rank of Lieutenant Colonel will lose at least £50 per year pension?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK) (Surrey, Guildford) (who replied) said: A certain number of Majors will have their chances of promotion impaired by the reduction in regimental establishments; but I cannot admit any claim to compensation arising on such grounds. The original Warrant of 1877, which brought in compulsory retirement, made a liberal provision for compensating what were then looked upon, perhaps justly, as the vested rights of purchase officers; but in the preamble of that Warrant, and of every subsequent Warrant on Promotion and Retirement, it was clearly stipulated that no future claim should arise for compensation in regard to any promotion or pension which might be affected by any Warrant or change of regulation issued thereafter. This I must adhere to as a general principle; and, as regards this particular case, I may point out that before the changes of establishment made in 1881 there was only one Lieutenant Colonel in a regiment of Cavalry or battalion of Infantry, so that the present senior Major would, but for that change, have been the second Major, with only one officer in the rank next above him.

WAR OFFICE—REGIMENTAL TRANSPORT AT ALDERSHOT—GENERAL SERVICE WAGONS.

COLONEL LLOYD ANSTRUTHER (Suffolk, Woodbridge) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the case that the general service wagons, just issued to the Regimental Transport at Aldershot, have not had their guard-irons and foot-boards altered according to pattern laid down in War Office Order, No. 4741, of 1885; and, if so, who is responsible for such omission; whether the Order quoted was issued on account of some men of the Army Service Corps having been killed and injured, owing to accidents caused by the defective construction of the guard-irons and foot-boards, prior to 1885; and, whether the reserve of general service wagons in store are all of defective pattern?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (Mr. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: The wagons issued lately at Aldershot are only intended for use temporarily till others of the altered pattern are received from Woolwich. No wagons are issued from the reserve store at Woolwich until they have been altered in accordance with the Order of 1885. Orders were given to have all wagons altered according to the pattern specified in the Question; and those at Aldershot ought to have been so altered locally, as they were in store there when the orders were given. I will cause inquiry to be made as to the cause of the omission. The Order of 1885 was issued in consequence of a fatal accident to two men of the Commissariat and Transport Corps.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE BROTHERS HOWARD, IMPRISONED FOR CONTEMPT OF COURT.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether information has reached him that the two brothers named Howard, in Kilmainham Gaol since June, 1886, under committal by the Vice Chancellor of Ireland for contempt of Court, are both men of weak intellect, in fact almost imbecile, and incapable of understanding the reason why they were committed to prison, or why they are kept there; whether, in a Return recently presented to Parliament, the mental condition of both these men is described as "indifferent;" will he make inquiries into those cases, and get a full Report from the medical officer; and, if the facts are as indicated, will he take steps to obtain the release of the Howards?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said, he understood the brothers Howard were committed not by the Vice Chancellor, but by the Judge of the Land Division of the High Court of Justice. The prison medical officer had furnished a Report as to the mental condition of the men; and the Chief Secretary would have that Report forwarded to the Judge, with a view to his taking such action as he thought right.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): May I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman to answer the latter part of the Question?

MR. HOLMES: I have answered it.

DR. KENNY: I beg to say that I will repeat the latter portion of the Question.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—IMPRISONMENT OF MICHAEL SPILLANE.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Michael Spillane has been confined in Kilmaham Gaol since the 19th January, 1886, when he was committed by Judge Boyd for unsatisfactory answering in the Bankruptcy Court; whether all his assets were subsequently realized, and the entire proceeds handed over to the Court; whether his wife, a fortnight after her confinement, and nine children, the eldest under 15 years of age, were turned out of their house and obliged to take refuge in the Killarney Workhouse, where they still remain; whether, in a Return recently presented to Parliament, the medical officer of the gaol reports that this man has a serious cardiac affection; and, whether, considering the punishment already inflicted on Spillane, he will make representations in the proper quarter with a view of obtaining his release from prison?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said, Spillane had been committed by Judge Boyd under the circumstances stated. He had no means of ascertaining whether the statements in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Question were correct or not. A Report had been received from the medical officer of the prison that the man was suffering from a cardiac affection, and that Report had been forwarded to the learned Judge.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.) asked, would the Government take immediate steps to have the man liberated?

MR. HOLMES said, the Report of the medical officer had been sent to the learned Judge by that evening's post, and the Government could not do anything beyond that.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked, were periodical Reports not made in regard to prisoners of this description?

MR. HOLMES said, if the hon. Member wanted an answer to that Question he should put it on the Paper, as he (Mr. Holmes) was not acquainted with the procedure of the prison in the matter.

SCOTLAND—TWEED FISHERIES— ALLEGED TRESPASSES.

MR. A. L. BROWN (Hawick, &c.) asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. David Maxwell, journeyman saddler, who it is reported on the 30th April last was fishing for trout on that part of the River Tweed, near Kelso, known as the "Junction Water," which it is alleged has always been open to the public for trout fishing, and no intimation has been made that it is closed; whether Mr. J. F. W. Drummond, Writer to the Signet, who leases a salmon fishing on the Tweed, which includes the "Junction Water," ordered Mr. Maxwell to desist from fishing, and, on his refusing, pushed him from a boat, so that Mr. Maxwell was immersed in the river; whether this assault was reported to the County Fiscal, who refused to take it up; and, whether he will instruct the Fiscal to proceed with the case?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. H. A. MACDONALD) (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): My attention has been called to this case. I understand that Mr. Drummond, who is lessee of the fishing at the part of the river in question, has always permitted angling for trout, and has no intention of preventing members of the public enjoying this sport; but he does object to people wading in deep and fishing into the salmon casts of which he is tenant. On the occasion in question Mr. Drummond was fishing for salmon, and Mr. Maxwell was up to his middle in the water fishing for trout in the same pool. Mr. Drummond remonstrated with him, and told him that, while he did not object to his fishing for trout at other parts of his water, he objected to his wading into his salmon cast, and he repeatedly asked him to leave that part of the water. Mr. Maxwell, erroneously believing that his having fished for many years on that water gave him a legal right to do so, refused to leave the salmon cast; and Mr. Drummond, coming up in his fishing boat, insisted on his going away, telling him that if he would not legal proceedings would have to be taken. Mr. Drummond did give Mr. Maxwell what the onlookers described as a slight push on the shoulder with his hand. Mr. Maxwell fell. He at once said he had got what he wanted, presumably meaning that he had got a legal case. He was not injured, and went on fishing for some time. On a complaint being made, the Procurator Fiscal made an inquiry, and was satisfied that there was not ground for a criminal prosecution. I have seen the note of evidence taken on the inquiry, and also a fuller precognition taken since, and I concur in the opinion of the Procurator Fiscal.

MR. A. L. BROWN: I should like to ask the Lord Advocate if a poor man may push a rich man into the water?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

WAR OFFICE (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)—COLONEL MAITLAND, SUPERINTENDENT OF GUN FACTORY, WOOLWICH.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether it is the fact that it is in contemplation to appoint Colonel Maitland (Superintendent of Gun Factory at Woolwich) to a higher post; and, who is chiefly responsible for the design of the 14 43-ton guns condemned as worthless, after the bursting of the Collingwood's gun, and which cost about £90,000?

MR. HANBURY (Preston) also asked, What use it was intended to make of the 13 guns which had not burst, and which had been condemned as useless?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL (Mr. NORTHCOOTE) (Exeter): The first part of the Question is for the Secretary of State. I can only say that, as yet, I have received no information on the subject; and I presume that my right hon. Friend is unlikely to consider questions of new appointments until he has studied the Reports of the Royal Commission and of the Earl of Morley's Committee on the Manufacturing Departments. With regard to the second part of the Question, Colonel Maitland accepts the responsibility for the design and submission of the Collingwood gun to the Ordnance Committee. So far from these guns being condemned as worthless, they are being chase-hooped and issued for service in the forts, and are used with most satisfactory results for testing the new steel armour-piercing projectiles. As regards the chase, the part which failed, the design was in conformity with the practice of the best Continental makers of ordnance, all of whom have been compelled to follow the chase-hooping plan which has been adopted by us.

CHARITABLE DONATIONS AND BEQUESTS (IRELAND)—THE EATON BEQUEST.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests made a Special Report to Government or to the Attorney General for Ireland, in reference to the disposal of the fund left by the will of Miss Catherine Eaton, to establish a woollen factory in the town of Wicklow; and, if so, will he lay it upon the Table of the House?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University) (who replied) said, no such Special Report was made to the Government; but the case was laid before the late Attorney General for Ireland for his opinion. That case could not be laid on the Table of the House; but he would allow the hon. Member to see it if he called at his Office.

LIGHTHOUSES AND LIGHTSHIPS—TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION—LORD CRAWFORD'S COMMITTEE—TORY ISLAND.

LORD ERNEST HAMILTON (Tyrone, N.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, When the Report of Lord Crawford's Committee on the Connection of Lighthouses and Lightships with the Mainland by Telegraph Communication, so far as regards Tory Island, will be laid upon the Table?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Board of Trade are informed by the Committee that their Report will be sent in with as little delay as possible. I am not aware that a special Report will be made with regard to Tory Island.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—
CARRICKAWILKIN (CO. ARMAGH)
NATIONAL SCHOOL.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a teacher has yet been appointed to fill the vacancy created in the Carrickawilkin (County Armagh) National School, by the dismissal of Mr. T. A. Irwin; and, if not, will he explain the cause of the delay, and when it is intended to make the appointment?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): A communication has been received by the Board of National Education from the management of the school announcing the appointment of a new teacher.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS—THE TREASURY MINUTE.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, How many Civil Service writers have, under the terms of the Treasury Minute of the 22nd December last, been recommended for promotion to the Lower Division clerkships; what number of writers so recommended have been placed on the Lower Division; and, can he also state the number of writers who have accepted the gratuity offered, and have left the Government service?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to answer Questions relating to the writers. I practically answered this Question in my reply to the hon. Member for the Harbour Division of Dublin (Mr. T. O. Harrington) yesterday. The number of copyists who have accepted the gratuity and left the Government service is 31.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)— THE PIER AT CAPE CLEAR ISLAND.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether it is a fact that a pier, which was constructed by the Commissioners of Irish Public Works at Cape Clear Island 12 years ago, is, for all practical purposes, useless to the inhabitants of that Island; whether the expenses of said pier were partly defrayed by local contributions; whether a Memorial praying that its defects would be remedied was received by the Commissioners of Irish Public Works in 1884; and, whether, considering the importance of Cape Clear as a fishing station, steps will be taken to make the pier of some advantage to the inhabitants of the Island?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said: The information which comes to me does not show that this pier is useless for all practical purposes. The expense of erection was partly defrayed by local contributions. A Memorial was received on October 29, 1883, and was forwarded the next day to the Commissioners appointed under the Sea Fisheries Act, who, however, did not see fit to allocate any sum for the execution of works. The Board of Works have no funds at their disposal at present which could be applied to improvements at Cape Clear.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): May I ask the hon. Gentleman for what practical purposes is the pier useful? I know none.

[No reply.]

BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND)
—LOO ROCK.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade, Whether it is a fact that the men employed by the Board of Irish Public Works at Loo Rock for the past three years have recently discontinued working; and, if so, when their operations will be resumed?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.) (who replied) said: In consequence of the exposed position of this rock—which is also little above low water—it is impossible to execute works on it except in very calm weather, and, therefore, the works were suspended on October 29 last. The chief engineer to the Board of Works visited the rock on the 12th instant, and has called for a tender from an experienced contractor, which it is expected will be received within the present week.

Baron Henry De Worms

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE—METHODS OF TESTING SPIRITS IN BOTTLES.

MR. YOUNG (Christchurch) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether complaints have reached him that it is the practice of Her Majesty's Officers of Customs and Excise to open bottles taken from cases containing spirits, and to withdraw therefrom a considerable portion of liquor, in order to test the strength of the spirit contained therein, and then to replace the bottles so opened in the case from which they were taken without any notification of the fact to those to whom such cases are consigned, thus entailing a considerable loss to the consignees on the cases so opened; and, whether he will take steps to remedy this grievance by having the cases so opened specially marked and charged with a lower duty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN) (St. George's, Hanover Square): I have received no complaints on this subject, nor have the Board of Inland Revenue, and I understand that the Board of Customs seldom receive any. The process of sampling and testing the strength of spirits is too long for me to explain in answer to a Question; but if the hon. Gentleman will speak to me I shall be happy to put him in communication with the Boards of Customs and Inland Revenue, who will give him every information. I may, however, say that no bottle is sampled without being labelled as such.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE EDUCATION ACTS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the Royal Commission on the Education Acts are expected to report at an early date?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE) (Kent, Dartford), in reply, said, that another volume of evidence had been issued by the Royal Commission. He feared there was no chance of the Report being presented before the close of the present Session.

ADMIRALTY — THE DOCKYARDS — GRATUITIES TO DISCHARGED WORKMEN.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty,

Whether it is a fact that a gratuity of one month's pay was awarded to workmen of seven years' service on being discharged from Chatham Dockyard; and, whether he will extend a like favour to the men under notice to be discharged from Haulbowline on the 1st June?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The gratuity of a month's pay which is to be awarded to certain classes of workmen of Chatham Dockyard will be extended to all classes of workmen of similar standing and occupation who may be discharged this year in consequence of the reduction of the Dockyard establishments. I cannot say now if the men under notice to be discharged from Haulbowline on the 1st of June will come in this category; but my impression is that they will not.

IRISH LAND COMMISSIONERS — SITTING AT CLONMEL.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) (for Mr. J. O'CONNOR) (Tipperary, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the Land Commissioners have not sat in Clonmel since February, 1884; whether a large number of cases for settlement of rent have been listed for hearing from the surrounding districts, some of the originating notices having been served nearly three years ago; and, whether he will inquire if the Commissioners can advance the date fixed by them for the hearing of these cases?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The Land Commissioners report that the facts are in no wise as alleged in the Question. The Munster Sub-Commission held sittings in the County Tipperary in May, 1886, and sat in Court at Clonmel towards the end of that month. No Tipperary cases in Clonmel Union were then left remaining over; and of the part of the County Waterford which is situate in Clonmel Union there are only three cases remaining over from the June, 1886, sittings, from which they were necessarily adjourned. The hearing of Tipperary cases will probably be again taken up in the usual course towards the end of July. It would not be practicable to advance the date.

INDIA (BENGAL)—MANUFACTURE OF SPIRITS.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been drawn to the announcement that it is in contemplation to establish 52 out-stills for the manufacture of spirits in the Hugli District of Bengal; whether one such out-still was opened at Bhastarah, on the 1st of April last, with the effect of disturbing the peace of the village; and, whether he will communicate with the Government of India, with a view to suppress these provocations to intemperance?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The statements implied in this Question would come under the notice of the Government of India in the ordinary course. The Secretary of State has no information about them, and he does not think it necessary to send a despatch on the subject. This Question, and others recently put by the hon. Member, seem to suggest that our policy in India is to encourage intemperance for the sake of revenue. I am informed that the precise contrary is the fact. The consumption of spirits is checked by a repressively high duty; and since 1872, in consequence of improvements in the Abkari Administration, the number of liquor shops has steadily and appreciably decreased, notwithstanding the increase of the population during that period.

INDIA—ADMISSION OF NATIVES AND EUROPEANS TO THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

MR. KING (Hull, Central) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government of India, having, since the Commission as constituted under Sir Charles Aitchison broke up, appointed a limited Sub-Committee to inquire into the subject of the admission not only of Natives but Europeans to all the more important branches of the Public Service connected with the Civil administration of the country, thus largely extending the scope of the inquiry, any arrangements have been made to give the Uncovenanted Service a fair opportunity of laying its grievances before the Committee; whether his attention has been called to the expressions of alarm in the Indian Press and among the Anglo-Indian community at the course being pursued by the Government of India, owing to the suspicion that very important changes are contemplated in the organization and condition of the Services, especially in the direction of a large admission of Natives to important positions in the Services; whether the Under Secretary of State has information that the Bengal Chamber of Commerce has had submitted to it a letter strongly deprecating the course now being pursued by the Government in relation to this question; whether, having regard to the grave interests involved, he can make any statement with regard to the ultimate object of the inquiry, and the time within which it will be brought to a conclusion, which may have the effect of re-assuring investors and others having interests in India that no serious changes are about to be made in the direction indicated in the above letter; and, what object the Government of India has in view in its present proceedings?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (SIR JOHN GORST) (Chatham): The Public Service Commission has not broken up. It was originally appointed in consequence of a Despatch of the Earl of Kimberley, dated 15th July, 1886, to inquire into the admission of Natives of India to officers formerly reserved exclusively for members of the Covenanted Civil Service. The Resolution of the 4th October, 1886, appointing the Commission, and the Resolution of the 8th March last, appointing the Sub-Committee, referred to by the hon. Member, have been laid upon the Table. From the former of these Resolutions it will be seen that the necessity for appointing such a Sub-Committee as that referred to was contemplated from the first. The latter of the Resolutions states the subjects referred to the Sub-Committee for inquiry, as—

“First, the present Regulations of the various Departments as to admission to the various grades and ranks in each; the conditions of service in each Department; and the capacity for rendering efficient service therein of the various classes who put forward claims to such employment.”

As regards the question of grievances, I must refer to the answer which I gave on the 12th. It is for the Commission and the Sub-Committee to make arrangements for obtaining full information on the subjects of the inquiry; and I have no reason to suppose that the Uncovenanted Service will not be given a fair opportunity for stating its grievances. I hope that this explanation will dispel the alarms and suspicions referred to in the second and third paragraphs of the Question, which have found expression in the newspaper articles and the letter mentioned. As regards the action to be taken in the future, it is intended that the Sub-Committee shall conclude its inquiry by the autumn, and that then the Commission, as a whole, shall be re-constituted, for the purpose of preparing one single Report, covering the whole subject. The Report, it is expected, will be submitted to the Government of India in the course of next winter. Any changes which the Government of India may have to propose after considering the Report of the Commission will be submitted, in the ordinary course, to the Secretary of State in Council, and will be considered with the care due to the importance of the subject before receiving the sanction of Her Majesty's Government.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE CONSTABLES AT THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, How many hours is supposed to constitute one day's work for the constables in and about the House of Commons; will he recommend that each constable be paid for any overtime; and, whether he will say the reasons given by Sir Charles Warren for refusing to pay them for any overtime during the last six months?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (MR. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: The Secretary of State is informed by the Commissioner of Police that the average number of hours during which police constables are employed in the House is not greater than that of men employed in other public buildings, as although they have more hours on certain days they have lighter work on Wednesdays, Saturdays, and Sundays. They get about 25 per cent more pay than constables employed at ordinary work, and duty in the Houses of Parliament is very eagerly sought after by members of the Force. On special occasions, when the messengers of the House receive extra pay, the Commissioner of Police recommends a similar allowance to the police on duty. He has done so within the last six months. The Secretary of State does not intend to make any recommendation to the Chief Commissioner on the subject.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND)—PROCLAIMED MEETINGS IN ULSTER.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether information has reached him that an organized attempt to suppress public meetings in Ulster is being made at present, by the calling of counter meetings at the same time and place, with the object of having both meetings proclaimed; and, if so, whether the Government will take steps to secure the liberty of public meeting in Ireland? I wish to ask also, Whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that it is the intention of the Orange Society to suppress National public meetings in that fashion in the North of Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The hon. Gentleman is probably aware that the Question of which he gave me private Notice was asked yesterday in the House by the hon. Member for East Mayo (MR. DILLON), and that there was a debate late at night on the same subject. I do not think I can add anything to the statement of policy which I then made on behalf of the Government.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Has the right hon. Gentleman received the information that the placard, in consequence of which the Nationalist meeting at Dungannon was suppressed, was concocted by the Earl of Ranfurly, a Justice of the Peace, and his agent, also a Justice of the Peace, in the shop of Mr. Aiker, in the town of Dungannon, and if the announcement to hold the Orange meeting was the only reason why the original meeting was proclaimed?

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—ARKLOW HARBOUR WORKS.

MR. W. J. CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he is aware that nothing has been done to repair the pier on the north side of Arklow Harbour, and that a quantity of old piles and blocks of stone are thrown in the bed of the river, obstructing the entrance to the harbour; and, whether he will direct the Board of Works forthwith to complete the work in accordance with the original contract, as set forth in Parliamentary Paper [C. 4775]?

THE SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I am informed that no representations have been made to the Board of Works as to débris from the old north pier at Arklow obstructing the entrance to the harbour, and no obstruction is believed to exist. Nothing has been done towards repairing the old pier; but the new north groyne proposed to be constructed when the plans were approved would occupy the site of the old pier, and doubtless improve the entrance. As, however, the hon. Member is well aware, no steps can be taken for the construction of the new groyne until the township of Arklow shall have given a guarantee for any excess caused in its construction over the sum originally provided for the harbour works at Arklow.

MR. W. J. CORBETT asked, was it not the fact that the original sum was quite sufficient to cover all the expenses of making the harbour according to the original plan; and that it was in consequence of a departure from the plan that the additional expenses had become necessary.

MR. JACKSON said, the answer to that must be that the sum originally granted was not sufficient, because it had proved insufficient. He had been assured that every precaution would be taken to make the work complete.

THE GROUSE DISEASE.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) (for Dr. FARQUHARSON) (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether his attention has been drawn, by announcements in the Press and elsewhere, to the outbreak of grouse disease in various parts of Scotland, and the North of England; and, whether, in consideration of the great scientific, pecuniary, and other interests involved, he will direct an investigation into the nature of the epidemic, to be undertaken by the officers of the Veterinary Department?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE) (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) (who replied) said: Grouse disease cannot be dealt with by the veterinary officers of the Privy Council, as the Acts under which they work are limited to "four-footed beasts," and the Department have no funds at their disposal for undertaking such an investigation as that referred to in the Question.

THE EXECUTIVE (IRELAND)—THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER SECRETARY TO THE LORD LIEUTENANT.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When it was intended to bring in the promised Bill to regularize the position of his Under Secretary; if his attention has been called to the speech of Colonel King-Harman, M.P., at a meeting held on 10th January, 1884, in Rathmines Rink, to protest against Earl Spencer's action in removing the Earl of Rossmore from the Magistracy, when the present Under Secretary for Ireland declared he was an Orangeman; if he is aware that at the meeting called to welcome the Right Hon. W. H. Smith, in the Rotunda, Dublin, on 24th January, 1884, the Under Secretary is reported to have said—

"It was easy enough in the North for men to stand together. The Orange Association, of which he (Colonel King-Harman) was a member, was a strong bond of union for men professing one faith in this country; " whether the Resolution of the House of Commons of 11th August, 1835, directed against the Orange Society, has ever been rescinded; whether, on 23rd February, 1836, this House presented an humble Address to the Crown to—

"Take measures for the effectual discouragement of Orange Lodges and all Societies excluding persons of different faiths using signs and symbols and acting by associated branches," to which on 25th February, 1836, a gracious reply was immediately returned by the Crown; whether thereupon a Treasury Minute, dated 15th March, 1836, was issued, declaring that any Orange Civil Servants should immediately withdraw from the Order, and that no person "who serves in whatever capacity under the Crown" should thereafter become a member, or be in any way connected with, the Orange Body; and, whether the Government have ascertained if Colonel King-Harman has withdrawn from the Orange Order?

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, may I ask him if he is not aware that, in accordance with the Resolution referred to in the Question, the Grand Orange Lodge of Ireland was totally dissolved in 1836; and if in 1845 the Orange Institution was not re-organized upon a new basis, in consequence of the revolutionary proceedings in the agitation for the repeal of the Union under O'Connell?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): A Bill dealing with the Office of Parliamentary Under Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant will be brought in as soon as practicable; but it is impossible, in the present state of Public Business, to fix a date. My attention has not previously been drawn to the particular incidents referred to in the second and third paragraphs of the Question; but I understand from my right hon. and gallant Friend that the statements are substantially accurate. With regard to the matters of history to which the hon. and learned Member refers, the House is aware that the Orange Society, which was the subject of the Resolution and Treasury Minute mentioned, was dissolved by its own authorities; and that, as explained by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), in reply to a similar Question three years ago, the Society was subsequently re-constituted on an entirely different basis, without secret signs or religious ceremonial. Under successive Governments since these occurrences membership has not been held to be a bar to employment under the Crown; and, in these circumstances, Her Majesty's present Advisers agree with the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian on the occasion I have already referred to, that—

"It would not be discreet or considerate on the part of the Government . . . to carry into execution a Minute which had remained in abeyance for a long time, but which was aimed at the provisions of a certain Society, which provisions had ceased to exist."

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Is the Bill to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred of such a nature as that it will have to be founded on a Resolution in Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In all probability that will be the case.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Has the Government made any inquiries to satisfy themselves whether the Orange Society does not still remain a Society with secret signs and symbols; and as to the point of religious faith, has the right hon. Gentleman seen books of the Society which show that members were expelled for marrying a Catholic—such as So-and-so for marrying a Papist?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not say anything about religious faith; but I spoke about religious rites.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Government of Lord Palmerston, in 1855, did, as a matter of fact, issue a Circular to the Lord Chancellor not to permit any Orangeman to become a magistrate, and stating they would not make Orangemen magistrates in future?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think it necessary to go behind the declaration of policy made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, to which I have referred.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND)— IMPRISONMENT OF FATHER KELLER.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, What official is responsible for the continuation of the proceedings in the Court of Bankruptcy which has caused the imprisonment of Father Keller; and, whether the usual course has been followed in these proceedings?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University), in reply, said, the usual course was taken in the case.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): May I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether there is any other instance in which the Official Assignee commenced proceedings against the unanimous wish of the creditors?

[No reply.]

WAR OFFICE — THE ORDNANCE COMMITTEE — APPOINTMENT AND CONSTITUTION.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Secretary of State for War, Who are the Members of the Ordnance Committee; by whom were they appointed, and for how long?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. E. STANHOPE) (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The names of the Ordnance Committee will be found in the monthly Army List, at page 44. The Military Members are appointed by the Secretary of State for War; the Naval Members by the Admiralty, with the Secretary of State's concurrence; and one represents the India Office. The usual term of appointment is three years, but the Committee is at present sitting during pleasure; and in the light of the approaching changes in the Ordnance Department, the whole constitution of the Committee will be reconsidered. The Civilian Members (Sir Frederick Bramwell and Mr. W. H. Barlow) have served since the appointment of the Committee in 1881, and were appointed by the Secretary of State for War.

PUBLIC PETITIONS—PETITION FROM BRADFORD—ALLEGED FICTITIOUS SIGNATURES.

MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.) asked the Chairman of the Committee on Public Petitions, Whether the attention of the Committee has been called to a Petition, lately presented to the House by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), purporting to be signed by inhabitants of the Eastern Division of the Borough of Bradford; whether he is aware that very many of the names appearing upon the Petition are those of children of tender years; that some of the persons whose names appear thereupon repudiate the signatures attributed to them, and declare their disagreement with the opinions expressed by the Petition; that, in some instances, children have been persuaded to write the names of their parents upon the Petition without the knowledge or consent of the parents; and, whether, under these circumstances, the Committee proposes to institute a searching inquiry into this and similar Petitions?

THE CHAIRMAN (Sir CHARLES FORSTER) (Walsall), in reply, said, that some of the signatures to the Petition referred to by the hon. Member were those of children of tender years; but it was not proposed to institute an inquiry.

LOSS OF LIFE AT SEA—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. GROTRIAN (Hull, E.) asked the Secretary to the Board of Trade,

Whether it is a fact that the evidence before the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the Loss of Life at Sea was closed already some nine months ago; whether any meetings of the Commissioners have since been held; and, whether the Report of said Commission has been drawn up; and, if so, when it will be laid before the House?

THE SECRETARY (Baron HENRY DE WORMS) (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Chairman of the Royal Commission on Loss of Life at Sea informs me that their proceedings were suspended during the winter by the absence abroad of two of its most important Members. The Commission have since met for the consideration of their Report, which they hope may be concluded shortly after Whitsuntide.

VACCINATION ACT—CONVICTIONS BY THE LEICESTER COUNTY BENCH.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Mr. King, of Mere Road, New Evington, in the County of Leicester, recently wrote to him appealing for remission of a fine inflicted by the County Magistrates on account of the non-vaccination of a child, dead nearly 12 months before the fine was enforced; and, whether he will state what answer has been given to this appeal?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: the Secretary of State did receive an application from Mr. King, and, after carefully inquiring into this case, answered that he was unable to interfere. King had been convicted and fined for not complying with the law. The fact that the child died before the vaccination officer, after repeated applications, proceeded to enforce the fine does not alter the liability of Mr. King.

THE MAGISTRACY (ENGLAND AND WALES)—NONCONFORMIST MAGISTRATES IN FLINTSHIRE.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why there are no Nonconformist Magistrates in Flintshire?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Mr. STUART-WORTLEY) (Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: I can only repeat, Sir, the answer which the Secretary of State gave to the hon. Baronet on April 4—that the Lord Lieutenant was not able to ascertain that there were any Nonconformists resident in Flintshire with the necessary qualifications.

WAR OFFICE—CORPORATION ROAD ROUND THE CITADEL FORT, PLYMOUTH.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Corporation of Plymouth are making a road round the Citadel Fort there in such a way as to deprive the troops quartered in it of their bathing place, and that there is no other place in Plymouth suitable for such a purpose; whether he will take immediate steps to prevent the men being deprived of the only bathing they can get in the summer months; and, whether it is true that the Government have handed over the whole of the ramparts and outworks of the fort to the Corporation of Plymouth?

THE SURVEYOR GENERAL OF ORDNANCE (MR. NORTHCOTE) (Exeter) (who replied) said: The road referred to does not debar the troops from access to their bathing place; but it renders it more visible to the public than it formerly was. The General Officer Commanding is considering, in conjunction with the Corporation, the arrangements to be made for the troops bathing. The outworks of the Citadel Fort have been leased to the Corporation; but not the ramparts.

ADMIRALTY—SUPPLY OF WELSH COAL TO HER MAJESTY'S SHIPS AT QUEENSFERRY.

MR. MASON (Lanark, Mid) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is the case that Her Majesty's guardship lying at Queensferry (within a few miles of the Salamanan Coalfields) is supplied with coal from Wales, costing a very much higher price; whether it is the case that the Admiralty tried coal from Scotland in 1876, and reported that it was found nearly equal to the best Welsh coal; and, whether he will take steps to put a stop to this apparent waste of public money?

THE FIRST LORD (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): It is the case that the guardship in question has been supplied with Welsh coal, which cost 13s. per ton alongside. The Scotch coal would cost less, but how much less cannot be stated, as no actual purchase of a large quantity has been made. The Admiralty tried coal from Scotland, as stated in the Question; but it was not found nearly equal to the best Welsh coal. The Welsh coal has the great advantage of being smokeless, and not choking the flues, neither of which qualities pertain to the Scotch coal.

MR. MASON asked, if the 13s. per ton included the carriage of the coal round from Wales to the Forth?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, it included the carriage.

BURMAH—LICENSING AND REGULATION OF IMMORALITY.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston) asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is true, as stated in an American paper, that—

“The presence of our soldiers in Burmah is made the reason for the licensing and regulating of vice, under the charge of high officials?”

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST) (Chatham) (who replied) said: The Secretary of State does not concur in the expression of opinion extracted from the American paper. Certain sanitary arrangements were made; but that does not constitute a licensing and regulation of vice.

MR. ATKINSON said, he did not put it as a matter of opinion, but as a fact. He would put the Question again in plainer words next Monday.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he is in a position to make any statement as to the course of Business after the Third Reading of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, and, more particularly, if he can state whether the Government intends to adopt any, and, if any, what, means to enable the House to overtake this year a fair proportion of the ordinary Legislative Business of the country?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): I am sure the hon. and learned Gentleman will understand that I am unable to make any statement with regard to the progress of Public Business after the Third Reading of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill. I hope the hon. and learned Gentleman will use his influence to forward that Bill. Until that Bill has reached a stage at which I can really hope for the Third Reading I will be quite unable to make any statement with regard to the Business. It is our desire to push forward Public Business, other than the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill, as rapidly as possible.

MR. E. ROBERTSON asked, whether the Government intended to regard the passing of that Bill as the special legislative work of the Session; or whether it was their intention to consider some other means whereby the ordinary Legislative Business of the country might be in part attended to, at whatever date the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill might pass?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Undoubtedly the Government do not consider that the passing of the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill would be a sufficient discharge of the duties of Parliament; and it will be their duty to consider what course they will recommend to Parliament under the circumstances.

CELEBRATION OF THE JUBILEE YEAR OF HER MAJESTY'S REIGN IN LONDON.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON (Liverpool, West Derby) (for Mr. WHITMORE) (Chelsea) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is intended to celebrate the Queen's Jubilee in London in any public manner?

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) asked, Whether the Government would reconsider their decision with regard to the display of fireworks in the public Parks, considering the pleasure they would give to hundreds of thousands of the people of the Metropolis?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): In answer to the last Question, which has been put to me without Notice, I can only say this—that the Government regret that any portion of the community should be deprived of any pleasure of the kind to which the hon. Member refers; and if funds could be found which would not be a charge upon the public purse, the Government would be exceedingly happy to afford any facility for the purpose; but they have not thought it right to submit a Vote to Parliament in order that the inhabitants of the Metropolis might be provided with fireworks. If we were to make such provision for the Metropolis, it would at once be asked what are we going to do for the large Provincial towns. I may be asked what provision we desire to make in other respects. That is a difficulty which I am sure the House will feel could not be easily solved. A Proclamation has been issued declaring Tuesday, June 21, a public holiday. On that day Her Majesty will proceed to the Service at Westminster Abbey. Any other celebration of the day will be entirely of a spontaneous and local character, no provision having been proposed to Parliament for public rejoicings in any other way.

MR. DODDS (Stockton): Will hon. Members have the opportunity of attending the Service at the Abbey on that day?

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he will ask the Poet Laureate to prepare an ode on the Jubilee Coercion Bill for the occasion?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is trifling with the House.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope to make arrangements by which Members of Parliament who express a wish to be present will be able to attend.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) Will that include the Irish Members?

MR. DODDS: Will each Member be allowed to take a lady?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Lord Chamberlain is the proper officer to approach in regard to such matters.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Mr. Speaker, may I ask you what arrangements you propose to make with reference to the attendance of the House on Sunday at St. Margaret's Church?

MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the right hon. Gentleman, I wish to inform the House that I propose to take my seat at that (the Clerk's) Table at a quarter to 11 on Sunday, and that I shall then go down the House to that door (under the clock). I hope that the Members of the Government, the Members of the Front Opposition Bench, Privy Councillors, and others who happen to be in the House will form behind me, so as to constitute the head of the procession. The Mace will meet me at the folding doors. I shall then proceed through the Members' Lobby to the Central Lobby, during which time I hope Members will fall in and form the rest of the procession. I would earnestly entreat hon. Members to observe the formation of four abreast. The Volunteers will keep a line which will admit of that number walking side by side. It will be very important that order should be kept throughout. From the Central Lobby I propose to go down St. Stephen's Hall to the top of the stairs in Westminster Hall, and thence down the main stairs of Westminster Hall to the north door of that Hall. At that door I believe that the clergy of Westminster Abbey and St. Margaret's Church will meet the procession and form the head of it. I shall then go through Palace Yard, through Parliament Square, through the central portion of that Square, between the two flower beds, and on reaching the end of the walk I shall take a line diagonally to the west door of St. Margaret's Church. I may say, perhaps, that the Queen's Westminster Volunteers have undertaken to furnish a guard of honour, and to keep the line throughout the whole length of the route taken by the procession; and I think I may tender to that gallant corps, on behalf of the House, my thanks for their presence on the occasion, and especially to the hon. and gallant Member for Central Sheffield (Mr. Howard Vincent), the Colonel of that corps. If there is any other information which I can impart to the House I shall be very happy to give it.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth): What arrangements are there for meeting our ladies on this occasion? Ladies' tickets have been issued.

MR. SPEAKER: I am scarcely responsible for all the minor details; but to allay the natural anxiety of the hon. Member I would, if I may, strongly advise the ladies to be present in St. Margaret's Church before the procession leaves this House.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Is it in contemplation to take a Resolution of the House in the sense which you, Sir, have mentioned, according to the precedent when Mr. Speaker attended on behalf of the House at the Thanksgiving Service at St. Paul's?

MR. SPEAKER: The House has already passed a Resolution.

MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon) asked, what arrangements had been made for the attendance of the House at the ceremony in Westminster Abbey on the 21st of June?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I understand that ample provision has been made by the Lord Chamberlain for the accommodation of the House on the 21st of June. But it is usual for a Committee of the House to be appointed to assist the Speaker in making the necessary arrangements for such an occasion; and if it is the pleasure of the House I will on Monday propose the appointment of such a Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the House sit on the 21st of June?

MR. W. H. SMITH: It will be a public holiday, Sir; and I shall move the adjournment of the House over that day.

DR. TANNER: If the weather is unsatisfactory on Sunday, Mr. Speaker, will omnibuses be provided for Members?

MR. SPEAKER: I will not answer a Question which I regard as trivial and offensive.

DOMINION OF CANADA—CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON (Liverpool, West Derby) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is true that Her Majesty's Government have been earnestly solicited by the Government of the Dominion to grant a subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway; and, whether, in giving this request their consideration, Her Majesty's Government will bear in mind the action of the Government of the Dominion in raising the duty upon imported iron, and will also endeavour to have an estimate made of the loss to those engaged in the iron export trade of this country which such increase of duty will entail?

THE FIRST LORD (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): The Dominion Government has earnestly solicited Her Majesty's Government to grant a subsidy to a line of steamers which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is willing to establish between Vancouver and Hong Kong. It is not suggested that such subsidy should be given as an assistance to the railway ; but the proposed steamship service is being considered on its own merits, the question being whether the advantages to this country and to the Empire generally of maintaining an efficient service of powerful vessels in the North Pacific will justify an application to Parliament for an annual subsidy of not less than £45,000. It has not been the practice to look upon the high tariffs which Canada finds it necessary to adopt as directly affecting the consideration of any general question in which the point arises whether or how far this country should co-operate with the Dominion ; but Her Majesty's Government cannot but feel that a change in the Canadian duties, such as that alleged, must indirectly affect the consideration of the main question, which must be ultimately decided by Parliament.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 217.]

(Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Secretary Matthews, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 19th May.]

[ELEVENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SUMMARY JURISDICTION.

Clause 2 (Extension of summary jurisdiction).

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 19, after "or," insert "to compel any person or persons by means of threats, intimidation, or violence."—(Mr. King.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): In supporting the Amendment I desire to point out that we have already decided that it is a criminal conspiracy for anyone "to compel or induce any person or persons not to fulfil his or their legal obligations." We now come to a very distinct and separate question, whether it shall be a criminal conspiracy to compel or induce any person or persons—

"Not to let, hire, use, or occupy any land, or not to deal with, work for, or hire any person or persons in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation."

Mr. W. H. Smith

We have to ask ourselves what a conspiracy is. It consists of an agreement, a means, and an object. No doubt, the mere act of an agreement is in itself a conspiracy ; but I need hardly point out to anybody with a grain of common sense that there cannot be criminality in an abstract agreement, and that the criminality of an agreement must be judged of either by its means or by its object. In this case the object of the agreement is, as I say, to prevent persons from letting, hiring, using, or occupying land, or from dealing with, working for, or hiring any person or persons. That object in itself cannot be criminal, because, at the present moment, anyone is perfectly entitled to refuse to let, hire, use, or occupy land, and so on. That being so, we have to consider whether the means are such that criminality is imported into the matter. What are these means? We have adopted the word "induce." If that word stands part of the clause, an agreement to use inducement to effect a lawful and legitimate object will be declared by the section to be a criminal conspiracy. Now I deny that inducement can ever be criminal. In strict legal language the word "induce" excludes any idea of fear or fraud, and the inducement cannot be criminal unless the object imparts criminality. But the object is not criminal ; therefore I am forced to the conclusion that if the clause stands in its present shape we shall have declared that it is criminal for two or three or more persons to obtain lawful objects by moral suasion. That would be an atrocious state of things. Supposing several people induce a testator to give a legacy of £100,000 to a certain person, does anyone say that because they have agreed to "induce" the testator the will will be void? If, under this clause, it is not intended, under such circumstances, to declare that an absolute crime is committed by persons who induce a testator to make a will, but it is intended to say that it is a crime to induce a person not to let, hire, use, or occupy land, is not the proposition preposterous? There is no doubt in the world that the object of the clause is to protect landlords, and to give them extraordinary legal remedies against people who refuse to let, hire, use, or occupy this land. Simple agreements to obtain a perfectly lawful object by means that up to the present moment are legal, are to be declared illegal, and persons taking part in such agreements are to receive six months' imprisonment with hard labour at the will of two Resident Magistrates who are under the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The Amendment is a different one from that which we had under consideration yesterday; but, at the same time, it would seem that the principle which governed the Committee in disposing of the Amendment yesterday should influence it now in disposing of this Amendment. It seems to the Government that the same arguments that were used yesterday are equally applicable to this Amendment. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hackney (Sir Charles Russell) moved words yesterday to provide that any person who should "conspire by violence or intimidation" to do the things specified in the sub-section should be liable to the penalties of the clause, and another hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. R. T. Reid) moved to leave out the word "induce," in order to confine the section to persons who compelled others to do the things specified therein. The Committee rejected both those Amendments yesterday, and the same grounds which led the Committee to reject them ought to lead it to-day to reject the present Amendment, inasmuch as its object is to limit the action of the sub-section—not in regard to the fulfilment of legal obligations, as was the case with the Amendment yesterday, but in regard to letting, hiring, using, or occupying land, and so on—to persons who compel others by means of "threats, intimidation, or violence." What we propose to do in the section is not to alter the law in the smallest degree from what it is now, but to enact that those means which apply now to the attaining of an object could be punished under indictment as criminal conspiracy shall, under this Act, be punished by summary jurisdiction. Such a case as that referred to by the hon. Member—the case of agreeing to induce a person to make a will—could not be punished under indictment, and will not be touched by this measure.

MR. CHANCE: I did not speak of the persons being punished; but I said would anyone say that the will would become void through adopting the means employed in this agreement?

MR. HOLMES: No; it would not; neither would an agreement to induce a person by moral suasion to refuse to let, hire, use, or occupy land be a criminal conspiracy. It would not be a criminal conspiracy now, neither would it be a criminal conspiracy under the Bill, because, as I have pointed out, the clause only renders punishable by summary jurisdiction what is now punishable by means of indictment. The hon. Member says that if we pass the clause as it now stands you will make it a criminal offence, punishable by summary jurisdiction, to agree to induce a person to attain a lawful object; but that is not the fact, for it is not an offence punishable by indictment at the present time to combine to effect a legal object by legitimate means.

MR. CHANCE: There is a great distinction between the object of obtaining the non-fulfilment of a legal obligation and the object of obtaining the non-performance of an act that a person is perfectly entitled not to do. There is no obligation pre-existing as the hiring of land. We are told that this clause will not make it criminal to do any act which is not criminal already; but that I altogether deny. A criminal conspiracy is to agree to adopt means to attain an object, either one of which must be criminal—either the means or the object. But, under this clause, to agree to attain by legal means—that is to say, by inducement—a lawful object may be made a criminal conspiracy. No one denies that we have these three things under the clause—agreement, means, and object. Inducement is laid down as the means. What question can arise outside the limits of these three things I utterly fail to conceive. We are told that an Amendment has been introduced and accepted by the Committee which will prevent a new offence being created under this Act. But if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) will take the trouble to refer to Mr. Justice Stephen on Criminal Law Amendment, or to the same authocity on Conspiracy, as given in pages 124 and 125 of Roscoe's Criminal Evidence, he will there learn that, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Stephen, reasons must be found by the Judge for declaring it to be criminal to combine to do an act which, in the opinion of the Judge, is politically or socially dangerous. And yet you are giving powers to two nominees of the Government, and investing them with the powers which Mr. Justice Stephen says the Judges already possess. Any combination which the Judge declares to be criminal is already punishable by law. By this Bill you are making the Resident Magistrates Judges, and giving them despotic power to declare an agreement criminal, and you point out clearly that a combination or an agreement to induce a person not to let, hire, use, or occupy any land is a criminal conspiracy.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): If this Amendment had been in principle decided, or came close to being decided, by the determination which the Committee arrived at yesterday, it would not be necessary for me to trouble the Committee much upon this question, because I should not be able to bring myself to repeat an argument with reference to it. Such repetition only weakens the position of a speaker in a case like this. On the other hand, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, I think, rather underrated the argument of my hon. Friend (Mr. Chance), and did not sufficiently appreciate the distinction he wishes to point out. But, whether there is or not a distinction to be drawn between the 1st and 2nd parts of the sub-section, I would suggest to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that this clause will have a serious effect upon the Ulster Tenant Right Custom which has prevailed for the past 100 years. The Ulster tenants have combined to refuse to take farms where the tenant right was not adequately recognized by the landlord; and clearly the sub-section under discussion, as it now stands, would render such combination a criminal conspiracy in the view of any Resident Magistrate who chose so to construe the provision. I cannot allow to pass without protest anything which would cast upon Ulster the stain that its tenants have been living in a criminal conspiracy for the past 100 years. I have known cases in Ulster in which farms have laid vacant for 20 years in consequence of refusal 'o recognize the tenant-right custom. I have known a case where a Protestant has been evicted from a farm in a Catholic district, and a foot would not be put into it by a Catholic farmer; and I have known a Catholic evicted in a Protestant district with a precisely similar result. I have known farms, under these circumstances, lie idle for 20 or 30 years, the owner merely disposing of the grazing of it. But few persons were mad enough to refuse the Ulster tenant right in the face of such a spirit as that. Then, what will happen now when evictions take place, and the landlord assumes possession of the land, the tenant forfeiting for a year's rent his 15 years' possession? The landlord will have 14 years of another man's property, and he will probably desire to get the land in occupation again to his own advantage. Whatever your laws may be, there will certainly be a higher law—that of honour and respect for another man's property, which will never be broken by the people of Ireland. What is the use of passing Criminal Laws to make men do a certain thing, which, though not criminal according to the law, is far more criminal in their eyes than that which this measure would make criminal, and which involves a greater penalty, from a social point of view, than the breaking of the law? I wish to draw a clear distinction between the decision we arrived at yesterday and the point raised to-day. I think the hon. Gentleman who put down the present Amendment was well advised. I believe I am correct that the hon. Member took the advice of those most able and experienced in these matters before moving the Amendment as to the form in which it should be brought forward. I admire the ingenuity with which he tried to reconcile his Conservative principles with what I consider his kind heart, for he has shown himself kind-hearted in this matter—he, at least, has been in Ireland and knows what we are. It is an extraordinary thing that we should now be supporting an Amendment moved from the other side of the House. I can understand the Committee saying that it is a conspiracy to induce a man not to do a thing which he is under obligation to do, and which a third person has a right to have performed. In that case there is a duty on one hand, and a right on the other; and if a conspiracy is got up to break the relations of the two men mutually bound to each other, there is some argument to be offered for making it criminal, because the conspirators would be without a reasonable excuse. But take the case of a farm which is vacant. There is no obligation on anyone to take it. A man may be induced not to take it, and pressure may be put upon him to refrain from taking it. The farmer prima facie may do what he likes with the farm; he may accept a person as tenant, or refuse him, just as he likes, and no one can complain; and equally the person sought to be induced or persuaded has incurred no duty with regard to its acceptance or refusal, and the person who induces or persuades him clearly should not be held criminal. It is a different thing where, in the words of the Amendment, a person is "compelled" by means of "threats, intimidation, or violence," not to take a farm. There is an obvious distinction between the 1st and 2nd part of the sub-section. In the one case a person is prevented from fulfilling a legal obligation. A man is compelled to do that which it is a breach of duty to do, and which it is a breach of another man's right to have done; and there may be some ground for calling that a criminal conspiracy. In the other case, you suppose a man who has a farm, which he has a right to let in the best way he can, but there is no duty on the community to take it, nor is there any obligation on any individual to do so, therefore there is no breach of any right of the landlord. But to go further than that, though the Amendment deals only with the question of land, there are many cases where it is the duty and right of a man to induce others not to buy at a particular time, or sell at a particular time, and to put up prices at a particular time. This right is recognized in England, and I must say I do not believe the commercial prosperity of England would have been at all what it is to-day if you had put shackles on the right of trade combinations. I only rise, however, to distinguish between the two parts of the sub-section—namely, the fulfilling of legal obligations—which we dealt with yesterday—and the taking of land with regard to which no legal obligation exists. To my own knowledge, the Ulster tenant right has been preserved by a practice which

I firmly believe, if this law had been passed years ago, would have been held to be criminal, and would have had the effect of throwing one-half of the tenant farmers of the Province into gaol.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I think that having regard to the quarter from which this Amendment comes the Government have received it with very scant courtesy. It would, indeed, be a curious result to see the clôture applied to it by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury; but we may take it, having regard as I say to the quarter whence it come, that the right hon. Gentleman will not think it necessary to take that course. I agree with my hon. Friends that we are forced to support this Amendment by the decision of the Committee last night on the proposal to omit the words "or induce." I think it is perfectly plain that there is a substantial distinction, not merely of form, but of fact, between the present Amendment and that moved last night by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Sir Charles Russell). The Attorney General for Ireland tells us that what is intended to be struck at by this clause is the use of illegal means. He says that this clause will not be operative in the case of any innocent combination, and that unless the means which any body of men combining together take to effect this object are illegal, this clause will not apply. I meet the right hon. and learned Gentleman on that ground, and I ask, if it is his view that this Bill should not apply save in a case where illegal means are used to further the object of conspiracy, will he consent to insert in the sub-section now under discussion, after the word "induce," not, perhaps, the words proposed in the Amendment, but words which will carry out his own expressed intention? Will he accept such words as "or induce by illegal means?" He says he does not want to limit the clause in the manner pointed out in the Amendment of one of his supporters. He says he does not want to limit it to threats, intimidation, or violence. Let him, at any rate, take means to carry out his own view, and to make his declaration perfectly plain. Let him put something in the Act of Parliament by which the uninstructed Resident Magistrates, who will have the administration of this clause, will see plainly what the Government want. I think we are entitled to an answer on that point. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says it is not intended that this Act should strike at any combinations to induce any persons by illegal means to do a legal act; and that being so, I ask them to embody in the words of this clause some expression which will make their intention perfectly plain, and from which the Resident Magistrates, who will afterwards be the administrators of the new law, will have the conclusion of the Government forced on them that this section is only to be used where there has been a conspiracy to induce persons to do an illegal act, or to induce persons to do a legal act by illegal means.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Gentleman, like his predecessors, is travelling rather beyond the permissible scope of this Amendment. The Committee have already refused to admit the words "or induce," and also to define conspiracy "by violence or intimidation." These two principles govern nearly the whole of the section, and the present Amendment is only admissible on the argument that in dealing with land there is a special necessity for the making of a definition.

MR. CHANCE: On the point of Order I should like to point out that the Amendment to strike out the words "or induce" had reference to preventing a person from fulfilling a legal obligation.

THE CHAIRMAN: No; that is not so. The words "compel or induce" govern the whole section.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I quite accept that explanation from you, Sir. It is quite evident, however, that the words this Amendment proposes to introduce only seek to govern the words of the section which deal with the letting, hiring, using, or occupying of land. We agree upon that, and I was under the impression that what I was saying, though general in its character, had a particular application to conspiracies as affecting dealings with regard to land. I come now to the words conspiracy to induce a person "not to let, hire, use, or occupy any land." What is the motive of these words—what is the meaning of this section which the Government have introduced in the Bill? On what ground have they based the necessity for this clause? The motive power the Government have used to press this Bill through the House is the undue intimidation as to the letting, hiring, or selling of land which they say has prevailed in Ireland. I venture to say that without the allegations they have made in regard to this undue intimidation a Bill of this kind would have been scouted from this House and this country. And, that being so, I ask is it not monstrous that while their whole case is founded on allegations of intimidation, they should push this Bill a step further than the extent to which their case of intimidation would show it to be necessary? If their case is that it is owing to intimidation that farms cannot be let, and that tenants combine to obtain reductions of rent, and their case is that it is owing to intimidation that combinations for these purposes, which would not otherwise exist, are so powerful in Ireland, I say, then, why not limit the clause to that particular point? I maintain that without the impetus that this Bill receives from these allegations of intimidation, it would have been impossible for the Government to have introduced it in this House, and it would be impossible for them to defend it before the country. At any rate, before they can ask the Committee to extend the Bill on the provisions of this clause beyond this question of intimidation, they are bound to make out a specific case outside "threats, intimidation, and violence," for the necessity of such extension. They have not attempted to do anything of the kind. They have not attempted to show that, apart from threats, intimidation, or violence, there are things which make such a clause reasonable. In all the wildest appeals we have heard from the opposite side of the House—and we have heard some most reckless assertions from that quarter as to the condition of Ireland—there has not been a single attempt to show that, apart from the question of intimidation, any case for this clause exists. If that is the case, are we not justified in asking that the Government, who found this Bill on allegations of the existence of intimidation—and found it on nothing else, for we are told that they do not rely on statistics of crime—shall limit it to the particular matter they allege as its origin? I do not think the Government are treating us fairly in this matter. We are not content with their general allegation as to the necessity for making this clause wide enough to introduce every possible class of offence. They do not even prove the existence of offences such as this Amendment will deal with. It seems to me, when such enormous powers are given and confirmed by a Bill of this kind, the Government are bound to produce justification, not merely for every clause of it, but for every line, every word, and every syllable it contains. Liberty should not be restricted, the Constitution should not be cut in upon, except to the extent for which a case been made out for it. If the Government complain that offences of a particular character exist, I submit that any remedy that Parliament applies should be limited to the case they make out. It is an old maxim in connection with the construction of Acts of Parliament that, in order to find out the object of an Act, you ought first to learn the mischief with which it is intended to deal. Now, I maintain that the remedy this clause provides is not limited to the mischief of which the Government complain. My complaint is that they extend the remedy far beyond any mischief they allege, and make it wide enough to include a vast variety of cases in regard to which they have shown no necessity for the clause. I say, therefore, if the words "or induce" had been left out of the clause, the section would have been sufficiently stringent to effect the avowed object of the Government. The Government case is amply vindicated by the adoption of the word "compel," and I think, if the section were limited to that word, the answer given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would be complete. But so long as they continue to retain in the section the use of the words "or induce," involving and describing acts which are not in themselves criminal, we shall be warranted in asking that where the object in view is not illegal, and where the conspiracy is a mere conspiracy to induce persons to do or not to do what it is perfectly legal for them to do or not to do, that then, at any rate, the House will step in and provide that some illegality shall be pointed to in the means taken to effect the object before the clause shall pass in its present form.

If the Government can make out a case for anything beyond what is in this Amendment, let them make it out; but certainly, up to the present, they have not attempted to do so. Until they have done so, I hold that we are justified in asking the Committee to limit the application of the clause.

MR. CHANCE: The Amendment, as it stands on the Paper, reads—"To compel any person or persons, by means of threats, intimidation, or violence." I fear that if we insist upon this Amendment, we shall be told that modification of this part of the section was refused, because we wished to confine it to threats, intimidation, or violence. I would ask to leave out of the Amendment the words "by means of threats, intimidation, or violence." We shall have a distinct issue then as to whether to compel a person to do or not to do what he has a perfectly legal right to do or not to do shall be rendered criminal or not. I assert, without fear of contradiction, that the word "induce" in this section is distinctly a description of method and means, and that the object not being in itself criminal, and it being necessary that the criminality should be found in the means here stated, the word "compel," and not "induce," should apply. If the clause is passed without this alteration, it will be for the first time the erection of a combination to induce persons to attain an object which is lawful into a criminal conspiracy. I would ask the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland whether it is contended that the words "or induce" do not constitute a description of the means and method of the object of a conspiracy? I do trust the Attorney General for England will deal with that question.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member move to omit from the proposed Amendment the words "by means of threats, intimidation, or violence?"

MR. CHANCE: Yes, Sir.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, after the word "persons," to omit the words "by means of threats, intimidation, or violence."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I would ask the Government whether, under these circumstances, they cannot see their way to accept the proposed Amendment.

MR. CHANCE: My object in moving this is that we may have a clear issue before us, and that we may leave no loophole of escape to the Government, who might say that they were compelled to reject it, because it would render the magistrates unable to arrive at a conviction for certain descriptions of unlawful combination.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): The Committee will understand my reason for not taking part in this discussion. It was that I consider the reasons which have been advanced more than once against the limitation of this section apply equally to the present proposal. I quite admit that it is a substantial modification which is now proposed, still the objections already taken will apply to it.

MR. CHANCE: The words have not yet been omitted from the Amendment. If the hon. and learned Gentleman would be good enough to permit them to be omitted, we should be delighted to hear how he can defend the application of the word "induce" to the series of acts contained in the clause which are perfectly legal.

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I do not see the use of leaving these words out if the Government are not going to accept the Amendment. If a number of men residing in a certain district see in their neighbourhood a man harshly dealt with by his landlord, they may say amongst each other—"What a shame it is! See how this man has been treated." Then, one may say, "I won't take that farm," and another may say, "Neither will I," and in this way there may be a combination not to hire, use, or occupy the land. Is it not preposterous to call that a criminal conspiracy? The inducements to which this clause will apply will cover the action of members of a Temperance or any other society who may say—"We will agree not to have a man in our association if he does so and so, or if he does not do so and so, and we will not hire or occupy his land." If the words it is proposed to leave out in the Amendment were omitted, we should give the Government power to proceed against these men, and to inflict upon them the punishment of law because a man was expelled from their ranks for going against the principles to which he subscribed, and which he had before his eyes when he entered their society.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have been in error in permitting the original Amendment to be moved at all. I have already pointed out that the words "compel or induce" have been adopted, and these words, I find, govern all the words which follow in the section. I had thought that a variation might be introduced with respect to dealings with land, but I see that the words of the section are—and so on. The words "either" and "or" clearly indicate that the word "induce" applies to the whole of the section.

MR. CHANCE: This Amendment is not ours. It is on the paper in the name of a Tory Member, and we, in his absence owing to illness, undertook to move it for him. I am not responsible for the wording of it, and all I can do on behalf of that absent Member is to submit to your ruling.

MR. T. M. HEALY: In the words as they originally stood in the Amendment, would it not be competent for us to discuss whether it shall be an illegal conspiracy to "compel" a person not to do certain things, instead of "compel or induce?" Could we not take out the word "or," so as not to limit the second part of the section?

THE CHAIRMAN: No; that could not be done, inasmuch as the word "either" governs the section as well as the word "or."

Original Amendment, and proposed Amendment thereto, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. O'DOHERTY: I propose, in line 19, after the word "occupy" to insert the words—

"Sell or exercise any customary privilege, usage, tenant right, easement, or profit à prendre in or over."

I propose this Amendment to meet the case of a combination of landlords in Ireland to prevent the tenants exercising the rights given by the Irish Land Act, and also to meet a case which is very common of organized interference with receivers of rent in regard to the customary privileges and rights of tenants in various parts of the country. These organizations are carried on in a very respectable manner, so far as outer eyes can see, and by very respectable people; but their effect is to injure others, and interfere with the rights which are secured to them by law. These things are done openly, so that in their case there is no necessity for a Star-Chamber inquiry. I am afraid that, considering the character of the Judge who will have to decide the cases, even if this Amendment were accepted it would be of little use; but I move it as a protest against what I see will be one of the effects of this clause—namely, the destruction of the Ulster Tenant Right Association. There will be, under this clause, cases of continual warfare; but, as a rule, the individual landlord can act against the tenant, so that the conspiracy will only be on the side of the tenant as against the landlord.

THE CHAIRMAN: In order to make sense, the hon. Member must move to admit the word "or" before the word "occupy."

MR. O'DOHERTY: Then I do that, Sir.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 18, leave out "or occupy," and insert "occupy, sell, or exercise any customary privilege, usage, tenant right, easement, or profit a prendre in or over."—(Mr. O'Doherty.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER) (Isle of Wight): I cannot understand what case the hon. Member has made out for this Amendment. He has stated very fairly and frankly that he proposes in some way to protect tenants against the operations of open associations which are not formed by illegal means. I should imagine that he wishes to direct his Amendment against the Commons Preservation Society, whose object is to prevent squatting; at any rate, I do not think he has made out a case for his Amendment.

MR. O'DOHERTY: At any rate, it is a great thing to have got from so high an authority as the hon. and learned Gentleman an expression of opinion that there can be combinations of landlords for the protection of their rights.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: No doubt that is so.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): In my judgment, the Amendment is one which, even if it were carried, the tenants would not be able to put in operation. The landlords have the appointment of the Resident Magistrates, practically speaking, and naturally the magistrates would not put this section into operation against their patrons, even if they had the power. However, I did think that we should have had from Her Majesty's Government some expression of disapproval of the practice on the part of some landlords of preventing tenants from availing themselves of the right to sea-wrack and bog. The difficulty that I see with regard to all these Amendments—though I quite approve of their object—is this, that if we passed 50 of them we should not derive any benefit, because the magistrates in the districts will be the landlords' henchmen, and will not carry out the clause against them. I do not regret the refusal of the Amendment by the Government, because even if it had been accepted, it would never have been put into operation, but would have been wrested in some way by the landlords against the tenants. I trust my hon. Friend will not persist in his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. M. HEALY: On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for South Kilkenny (Mr. Chance), I beg to move the insertion of the Amendment which stands in his name—namely, after "land," in line 20, to add "within such proclaimed district." I propose this Amendment, because I think the section should only apply to the criminal conspiracies specified when they take place within the proclaimed districts.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 20, after "land," insert "within such proclaimed district."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): I cannot accept this Amendment, as it would involve the manifest absurdity of excepting from the operation of the clause a conspiracy in a proclaimed district to commit an offence just outside that district. It is necessary to retain the clause as drafted in order to maintain the efficiency of this section.

MR. CHANCE: The right hon. and learned Gentleman says he cannot accept the Amendment, because it is necessary to protect the efficiency of the powers of Section 1. This is the argument upon which the Amendment is based, that you declare that it is only necessary to protect people within certain defined limits from illegal acts, or, rather, from acts against which by singularly unconstitutional methods you desire to afford protection. The presumption is that you wish to leave persons outside those proclaimed districts to the adequate protection of the ordinary law. It is for that reason why I do not see that a conspiracy within a proclaimed district to commit acts which are not in themselves illegal outside that district should be punished as are offences specially legislated for in the case of proclaimed districts.

MR. MAURICE HEALY supported the Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I maintain that the magistrates in Cork should not have power to deal with a conspiracy in Donegal—that they should not have power to bring to Cork a man from Donegal, or send to Donegal a man from Cork. The Act reads—“Any person who shall commit any of the following offences in a proclaimed district, etc.,” and amongst the offences is a criminal conspiracy. Well, a conspiracy may take place in an organization having branches at Cork, at Donegal, and elsewhere. Is it to be permitted that a man can be brought from Donegal to Cork simply because he belongs to an association which has a branch in each place? If the section is allowed to stand as framed you might have witnesses dragged all over the country. There is some confidence in the Common Law as it exists at present, for in those conspiracy cases which were committed in Galway, Monaghan, Clare, and Kerry, the defendants were tried in Dublin, and which, of course, involved considerable expense in railway fares and so on; but if you are to have people dragged indiscriminately all over the country, the effect will be infinitely worse.

MR. O'DOHERTY: I am afraid there is an idea that there is some virtue in a Proclamation; but no earthly good would be gained by carrying this Amendment, because the Proclamation would be widened so as to include both the conspiracy and the land. I do not see that the adoption of this Amendment would promote the object for which it is moved. Looking at the matter in the best way I can, it seems to me desirable to have the Proclamation issued in as limited a manner as possible. I think, therefore, that this Amendment should be withdrawn.

MR. CHANCE: The Proclamation must be issued by the Lord Lieutenant in a certain manner, and we have yet to discuss what the Proclamation shall be, and whether or not it shall be under the control of Parliament. My hon. Friend is prejudging this matter, and has taken upon himself to suppose that it will be competent for the authorities to enlarge the area covered by the Proclamation as they choose. If we decide that the Proclamations are to be under the control of Parliament, this will be impossible. The case of the Government is that in certain disturbed districts it is necessary to protect people by extreme methods. Admitting this case, I say that the real danger of conspiracy is to be found where the conspiracy can become effective for some particular object. If the land in respect of which a conspiracy is on foot is not in a proclaimed district, but in a peaceful district, then I say that a conspiracy fructifying into crime should be tried, not by this extraordinary summary jurisdiction, but by an ordinary Court of Law. I say it is reasonable, if we are to have special Courts of Inquiry under this Bill, that we should only have them to try offences that occur in specially proclaimed districts. They should not trench upon the ordinary law until the ordinary law has been found insufficient. I say that the Government should not, under cover of protecting people in a disturbed and proclaimed district from an offence, punish offences committed in a peaceful district where, according to their own showing—that is to say, by the absence of a Proclamation—the ordinary Courts of Law are sufficient for the maintenance of law and order.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to move, after “land,” in line 20, to insert “dealt with in the Land Act of 1881.” This Amendment is put down by me, because the Government have been saying that the character of the trouble in Ireland is agrarian, and that if the agrarian difficulty were got rid of there would be no trouble in Ireland. I propose, therefore, that they should deal with nothing that is not agrarian—that the clause shall not have a wider application than the clauses of the Act of 1881. I cannot see that the Government can have any difficulty in accepting the Amendment, as the Act of 1881 applies to all land that is a source of trouble and annoyance in Ireland. There may be land on which houses are built in towns, and common lands, to which this section would apply without this modification. But I think the land subject to the jurisdiction of the magistrates should be such land as forms a portion of that which you yourselves say makes the agrarian difficulty in Ireland.

Mr. Holmes

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 20, after "land," insert "dealt with in the Land Act of 1881."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HOLMES: I cannot agree to accept this Amendment, as it would leave untouched the Boycotting of grazing land taken for the summer months. The clause would not be sufficiently stringent if it were a mere reproduction of the corresponding clause in the Act of 1882.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to move, in page 2, line 20, after "land," to leave out from "or" to "occupation" in line 21. The words I propose to leave out are—

"Or not to deal with, work for, or hire any person or persons in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation."

These words deal with a difficulty which is shortly expressed in the word "Boycotting," and that is the point to which I wish to attract observation. I think the offence of Boycotting is sufficiently dealt with and met by the second subsection of this clause. The matter is not one with which we are dealing for the first time. Boycotting has been in existence since the year 1879, when the word was coined, I think; and in the year 1882, when the Government of the day were passing the Crimes Bill, they most carefully considered this matter, and framed a clause of their Bill which they considered amply sufficient to deal with it—namely, the Intimidation Clause, which Her Majesty's Government have adopted almost in identical terms in Subsection 2 of this clause. The point I make is this—that if the powers taken in 1882 were sufficient for the Government of that day to suppress Boycotting, the Government of to-day, who profess that this Bill is a milder measure than the Crimes Act, ought to be content with similar powers, neither more nor less. Her Majesty's Government have not made up their minds as to this question of Boycotting. Lord Salisbury told us that no legislation could put down Boycotting; but the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us on the second reading of this Bill that the Crimes Act did put down Boycotting, and that three months after the lapse of that Act Boycotting was introduced to some fabulous extent. I must assume that the latter opinion, being the more recent, expresses the mature view of the Government. If they consider that the powers taken in the Crimes Act were effective and sufficient for the purpose of putting down Boycotting, and if this is a milder measure than the Bill of 1882, why are they not content to introduce into this Bill the same provisions, no more and no less, than the Government of the day introduced into the Act of 1882? Let me point out that Subsection 2, as it stands at present, is amply sufficient to meet any difficulty that can be said to arise, and the Government can have no apprehension that its scope will be cut down by the tribunal to which they hand over its administration with such confidence. I remember, under the Act of 1882, defending a number of persons against the charge of intimidation under the clause to which I refer; and I remember one case where I appealed from two Resident Magistrates to the County Court Judge, and where we solemnly discussed the whole question of Subsection 2 for two days, the Judge reserving his judgment, and telling us on the next day that, in his opinion, the effect of this sub-section was that no one in Ireland could go anywhere and open his mouth to deal with any aspect of the agrarian difficulty, no matter how mild

the language he employed, without running himself into the meshes of this clause. He told us that while this clause was in force every man who spoke on a platform in Ireland without having a lawyer at his elbow ran a great risk of making the acquaintance of a plank bed, and thereupon he sentenced my client to two months' imprisonment. Now, that being so, the wording of this Sub-section 2 being of such a searching character, what more can the Government possibly want? Is there any possible phase of this Boycotting difficulty which is not met by either of the portions of this Sub-section 2. It makes it illegal, with violence or intimidation, to compel any person to do any act which he has a legal right to do, or a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which he has a legal right to do, and it makes it illegal to use violence or intimidation towards a person, in consequence either of his having done any act which he had a legal right to do, or of his having abstained from doing any act which he had a legal right to abstain from doing. That covers every conceivable case which can possibly arise under this offence of intimidation. That being so, I ask cannot the Government be content with the enormous power which this sub-clause gives them? What case have they made out for a more stringent enactment dealing with the subject of Boycotting than was made out in 1882 by the late Government when they were passing the Crimes Bill? They have not contended that the clause in the Crimes Act was found inefficient in any way. They have not ventured to offer any illustration, or give any instances, in which the clause contained in that Act was not amply sufficient for every purpose in dealing with those offences; and, that being so, I say that they are exceeding the bounds of moderation in not being content with this very searching clause of the Act of 1882, and in taking up, under this clause dealing with conspiracy, fresh powers to enable them to deal with the very same class of offences. I think that is the view under which we may properly ask the Committee to omit these words which I here propose to leave out. I cannot expect the Government to agree with the reason that it is monstrous to bring up every person against whom even a whisper of Boycotting is heard, and try them before the sort of drum-head tribunal proposed in this clause. I, therefore, address to the Government a reason drawn from their own Bill which they may fairly be expected to consider, and attach some weight to.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 20, after "land," leave out from "or," to "occupation" in line 21.—(Mr. M. Healy.)

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I quite agree that, if we could assent to the argument of the hon. Member—namely, that there is no necessity to go beyond the Act of 1882; that there will be no necessity for the introduction of these words. But we have over and over again pointed out, and we maintain the same ground now, that in our view there are important matters which it is essential to prevent, with which the Act of 1882 did not deal. It may be—and this is one of the arguments—that there may not be individual intimidation; but persons may meet together, and, without performing the acts themselves, may provide money or inducements or adopt other measures commonly practised by associations to compel, or induce others to take the steps complained of. I think it is desirable to have regard to these matters of conspiracy, and therefore I hold that the Act of 1882 is not sufficient.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): If these words in Sub-section 2 did not include the cases the hon. and learned Gentleman referred to then I could quite understand the objection to the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I think the words "now punishable by law" have very little meaning or protection as to this clause, because, under the judgment of Lord Fitzgerald, we know perfectly well that the words "now punishable by law" really amount to no protection at all. I would draw the attention of the Attorney General to two of the words it is proposed to strike out—namely, "work for." Now, to compel or induce anyone not to "work for" a person goes a great deal further than the circumstances of the case would seem to require according to the argument of the Attorney General. Under the words in this clause if a certain number of workmen induce their fellow workmen—not by intimidation, not by violence or threats, but merely induce—not to work for their employer because of some legitimate reason, they will be punishable under this clause. The hon. and learned Gentleman shakes his head. I know that, according to his argument, that would not be so, and if the word “compel” stood alone I should agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman; but we have here the word “induce,” about which there has been a great deal of argument, and that makes all the difference in the world. Under the word “induce” there may be legitimate reasons for one workman trying to influence another, and under the clause as it stands the magistrates—nay, even under the judgment of Lord Fitzgerald at the present moment, the magistrates will be entitled to say that inducement brought to bear upon a body of men not to continue working for their employer will be subject to the penal consequences attached to this clause. Under the Act of 1882 Boycotting is dealt with under the head of intimidation. Acts which are calculated to put any person in fear were condemned, and the same result might be efficiently attained by adhering simply to the word “intimidation” in this clause. The definition of the word “intimidation” at the end of the Bill would be sufficient protection; but as you have deliberately refused to put in intimidation, and give the protection which is conveyed in the definition of the word at the end of the Bill, I think I am perfectly entitled to say that any mere trades unionism, in the legitimate sense in which it has been explained in this House over and over again, would bring those indulging in it under the provisions of this Bill. The Government do not want to accept this Amendment, because they want to go a great deal further than is expressed in the words of the measure. But, at any rate, I am glad that a protest has been made, because, if it does nothing else, it will enable us to refer to the attitude of the Irish Representatives in any action we may have to take in the future—it may justify us in the position we may have to assume before the Resident Magistrates.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would ask the Government what is the use of their putting in this sub-section? It is absolutely useless. You have in a subsequent sub-section the words “Any person who shall wrongfully and without legal authority use violence or intimidation.” Your word “intimidation” there covers the whole thing. You say any person who shall do this to a person to make him do an act which he has a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing an act which he has a legal right to do shall be summarily prosecuted. Well, to intimidate a person to abstain from doing that which he has a legal right to do covers the words that it is proposed to leave out—namely—

“Not to deal with, work for, or hire any person or persons in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation.”

I may be told that, in the one case, the offence is conspiracy, and in the other it is not; but, surely, all you want to do is to punish the offender, and why should you not effect your object in the easiest manner? This drafting is perfectly absurd; all the filigree work of your draftsmen here is absolutely needless, so far as your Resident Magistrates, who will have to administer this measure, are concerned. Do the Government think that they can reach, under the words proposed to be left out, persons whom they could not reach under the 2nd sub-section—do they desire to punish men under the Conspiracy Clause for doing that which, if done by each man singly, would be perfectly legal? Suppose a man goes round to a village to sell his cow, and he cannot get anyone to buy it, is every person who refuses to buy it to be punishable under this section?—because there is your conspiracy at once. You have all conspired not to buy the cow. That appears to me to be perfectly absurd. Yet that seems to me to be what the clause provides for, for it says—

“To induce any person or persons not to fulfil his or their legal obligations, and not to deal with anyone in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation.”

That takes in absolutely everything. I am entitled to buy my cows from whom I like; but under this section I may be punished for agreeing not to buy them from a certain individual. Am I to be told that the Government are to forestal the market, so to speak—to rig the market—in the interests of particular persons? If a landlord sends his pigs into the market and fails to get a purchaser, are you going to punish everyone who refuses to buy except at their own price? That is what the clause really comes to. The idea in this clause that it is to be a criminal act "not to deal with" a person is most grotesque. Lord Salisbury's speeches are stuck up in letters of gold, I presume, at your firesides. If you read them, you will see that he says that you cannot, by legislation, interfere with Boycotting. He says that you cannot compel people to associate with a man—that if a man goes into church, and the other people present do not desire his society, no Act of Parliament that you can pass can compel them to pray with him. But apply this clause in this way, and you will see how iniquitous it is. If a man has cattle to sell, under the ordinary law you cannot compel people to buy them; but under this clause you will be able to do so. They may refuse to "deal" with him, and "deal" means "buy." Do let the Government consider well our proposal so far, at least, as "deal" is concerned. This word seems to me a repeating-rifle sort of thing—or rather, I should say, it is a grape-shot—it hits everywhere. To compel a man to sell you the necessaries of life is a very different thing from compelling a man to buy them, and yet that is what this section effects. It goes up and down—it affects buying as well as selling. It is absurd to say even that Boycotting ever prevented persons from purchasing. Even the Primrose League does not prevent people from purchasing from their own political friends. You can always buy from people of your own way of thinking; but compel persons to sell things if you like; do not say, however, that I must deal with a certain person. I will not. I will not buy anything because it is the landlord's—whether it is his pigs or potatoes, unless, indeed, I can get them at my own price. Why do not you pass an Act saying that these things shall be sold at such a price, and that if that price is not given it will be intimidation or conspiracy. I say this word "deal"—and you should add "or sell"—is a preposterous thing to put into this section. You may make a man sell, but to compel a man to buy is a thing that all the King's horses and all the King's men cannot make him do. He may have no money—he may plead the Bankruptcy Clauses of your Land Bill. I do ask the Solicitor General for England to make some statement on this matter, to give us his view of the section, and tell us what it means.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I am sorry that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hackney (Sir Charles Russell) is not here for the purpose of moving the Amendment in his name, to which he attaches, and I think many of us attach, great importance. In his absence he has asked me to move the Amendment on his behalf. I wish to say that the object of the Amendment is to prevent that which is unquestionably an evil in Ireland. The object we have in view is to enable the tenant-farmers in that unhappy country to know the landmarks by which they may distinguish between lawful combination, as far as this Act is concerned, and combination within its meshes. I know it may be said that some forms of combination may be crime for summary punishment; but we say give us some idea of what that crime is, however imperfect, by which the tenants may know how they can keep outside the penalties of the Bill. This subject has already been, to some extent, discussed on an Amendment already brought forward, and in that which I have to say I shall endeavour to avoid going over the old ground, although it is impossible absolutely to avoid going over it. There have been several Amendments proposed tending in this direction. Among others an attempt was made to provide that no combination should be punishable unless the means used were violence and intimidation; it was also proposed that the clause should be limited to cases of compulsion. These Amendments have not been accepted. We are, therefore, now practically fighting in the last ditch, and, perhaps, I may say without any great hope of success, but still with the view of making clear the point at issue between the Government and ourselves. I propose that in the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction that one man should not be punished for doing a thing which is innocent in the eye of the Criminal Law, merely because some other person combines with him to do the same thing—that unless the means employed, or the thing aimed at, constitute a crime, persons should not be punishable for combining together. Now, there are some peculiarities I desire shortly to touch upon in the law of Ireland, with regard to conspiracy, contained in a few sentences in a summing up of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, which distinguish the law of England from the law of Ireland, that is to say, so far as I know the law of England. I think no Judge in recent times has ever put in England the Law of Conspiracy to anything like the same use as that to which it has been put in the case of "The Queen v. Parnell." That learned Judge pointed out in that important trial that conspiracy consists in an agreement by two or more to do an unlawful act, or to do an act by unlawful means. I would point out that by the term "unlawful" it is not intended to confine the meaning of the term unlawful to what is in itself criminal. The learned Judge says—

"If, for instance, a tenant withholds his rent, it is a violation of the right of the landlord; but it would not be a criminal act in a tenant, though it would be a violation of a right; but if two or more agree to do that act there would be a criminal act."

I think it follows, from the law as here laid down, that it is possible, according to Irish Law, that there should be a conspiracy punishable which does not in any way involve a criminal object. Such a conspiracy might compass an unlawful end; but it is no more criminal than my refusal to carry out a bargain I may make with a cabdriver. There is one other matter referred to in the same judgment—namely, the extreme ease with which evidence is received in cases of this kind. The Judge said—

"I have to inform you that in the law of conspiracy there is no necessity that there should be an express act of conspiracy, but that the parties might then and there personally attempt to carry out the alleged purpose. It might be that the conspirators have never seen each other, and yet at law they are parties in a criminal proceeding."

That decision will not, I think, be disputed to be the Law of Ireland at the present time; and I say it has never been equalled and never rivalled by any decision in England of the like severity. It must, however, be remembered that this will be the Law of Conspiracy in Ireland before whatever tribunal a case arising out of the Act may come. Now let me apply that to the payment of rent. There is a land war going on at the present time in Ireland. Let me suppose that 40 or 50 tenants on an estate did not pay the rent. Then if it can be inferred that there was combination among them not to pay rent, that would be a criminal conspiracy according to the law of Ireland; and, further, it will not be necessary to show, in order to insure conviction according to the judgment of Lord Fitzgerald, that they have put their heads together or even that they are acquainted with one another; and notwithstanding that it is possible they may be found guilty because they have done a criminal act. This is the consequence I wish to avoid under this Bill, and if I am right in the view I take—namely, that this judgment of Judge Fitzgerald is the law, will the Government explain how it is that they can contend unless the present Proviso be adopted, that tenants, combining for the purpose of refusing to pay rent, which may be an unjust rent, are free from the meshes of this clause, or in other words, how this clause will not be available for the purpose of imposing criminal consequences upon the non-discharge of civil liabilities, a policy which I believe has been universally condemned? Whatever any man may think with reference to the propriety of refusing to pay rent, and I have never defended the non-payment of rent if honest and fair, no one can say that the non-payment of rent is criminal, and it is an abuse of language to speak of it as either a crime or an offence of such a character as deserves to be treated in an exceptional manner. I have referred to the fact that there is in Ireland a land war. It is a war, a contest, or conflict substantially of the same character as that which was waged in England between employers of labour and those persons who work for wages. The difficulty which existed in that case was solved in 1875 by a clause exactly the same as that which I am moving on behalf of my hon. and learned Friend. There must be Gentlemen in this House who recollect a keen, legal, and social contest waged around that question, and how it was settled by declaring that if there was intimidation, if there was violence or undue compulsion, then the law might interfere in a criminal way; but if there was persuasion or the mere pressure of social exclusion, then the law would be prevented from interfering. In the Act of 1875 the following section was introduced to regulate the relations between workmen and their employers. It was to the effect that an agreement or combination between two or more persons to do, or procure to be done, any act in furtherance of a trade dispute between employers and workmen, should not be indictable as conspiracy, if such act committed by one person would not be punishable as a crime. Now, the similar clause which I am about to move, and which, mutatis mutandis, will be identical in principle is this—

“Provided that an agreement or combination by two or more persons to do or not to do, or procure to be done or not to be done, any of the matters aforesaid, shall not be punishable under this section as a crime if such doing or not doing by one person would not be punishable as a crime according to the existing law.”

The parallel is absolutely complete, so far as the principle of the proposed clause is concerned, and I desire to point out why the parallel of circumstances is substantially identical. It has been said by the hon. Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) and other Gentlemen in the course of this debate, that there is a great difference between the two cases, inasmuch as in the case of those who are tenants in Ireland they would retain possession of the land, which, it is said, belongs to the landlord. Now, it is undoubtedly the case that they would retain possession of the land; but that does not make any difference at all. To begin with, the land is partially the property of the tenants, and therefore not exclusively the property of the landlords; but to rely upon that is to rely on a method of argument which utterly destroys all chance of arriving at a satisfactory analogy between the two cases. What I have heard with regard to trade disputes is, that you have a large number of poor people who have a struggle between themselves on a point in which they are mutually interested. That being so, I am unable to see what is the difference between these two classes. Now, in justice to the proposal which I present to the Committee, I appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and particularly to those of them who are willing, if they can, to prevent this Bill being made the means of wresting from the tenants of Ireland rents which they cannot pay, that while fighting intimidation, fighting violence, still more fighting against crime, that they should not allow this law of conspiracy to be so worked as to impose on the breach of a civil obligation the penalties attaching to a criminal offence. There is one other proposal in the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend on which I wish to address to the Committee a very few words. It is the second Proviso of the Amendment—

“That this sub-section shall not be held or construed to create any new crime, and no person shall be punishable for conspiracy thereunder, unless it be proved that the purpose of such conspiracy was either (1) the commission of a crime, or (2) the attainment of some object by means which are criminal according to the existing law.”

Now, as far as the first part of the second Proviso is concerned, I dare say it will be said that it has already been met by the words of the Amendment of the Attorney General for England; but I desire to point out to the Government that if they wish to try to meet Members who have honest objections to this Bill, they should admit such words as are in the first line of this Proviso, which make clear what we think is doubtful, and which, according to their own Law Officers, cannot affect the clause. This would limit the application of the punishment under the clause to every conspiracy which either attains, or seeks to attain, a criminal end, or seeks to attain a lawful end by criminal means. If this Bill be a Bill for the suppression of these crimes, surely it is never intended to leave the definition of them to the new tribunal. We are not seeking to codify the law in any sense; we are only trying to limit that part of the law which is to be entrusted to a strange and novel jurisdiction. The ground on which I press this on the Government finally is this, as I have said before, that this is a case in which, unless great care be taken, it is most likely that the operation of the new jurisdiction will be to do that which is contrary to the principles of the Trades Unions Act, and, as I think, to the principles of Common Law generally—namely, to interfere by means of the Criminal Law between two parties to a civil contract, one of whom is alleged to have broken his contract.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 22, after the word “Law,” to insert the words—“Provided that an agreement or combination by two or more persons to do or not to do, or to procure to be done or not to be done, any of the matters aforesaid, shall not be punishable under this section as a crime if such doing or not doing by one person would not be punishable as a crime according to the existing Law.

"Provided further, that this sub-section shall not be held or construed to create any new crime, and no person shall be punishable for conspiracy thereunder, unless it be proved that the purpose of such conspiracy was either (1) the commission of a crime, or (2) the attainment of some object by means which are criminal according to the existing Law."—(Mr. Robert Reid.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. HOLMES) (Dublin University): The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries will remember that he has in the course of his observations referred to the fact that the Law of Conspiracy has already been treated of in the progress of this Committee. I think we have had four or five discussions on the subject, and under the circumstances the Committee will not, perhaps, be surprised if the Government do not propose to reiterate the arguments they have already put forward. The hon. and learned Gentleman has made an observation which has more than once been made in the course of this debate—namely, that the Law of Conspiracy in Ireland seems to differ from the Law of Conspiracy in England. Now I have on one or two occasions denied that position, and I must deny it again. Of course the hon. and learned Gentleman must know that the law of the two countries is theoretically the same with reference to this matter. The Common Law of the two countries is the same, and any decision given in England would be received and quoted in the Courts of Law in Ireland. But, as far as I can gather from the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman, the suggestion that there is a difference between the laws of the two countries is to be deduced from some observations taken here and there in the charge to the jury by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald in the case of "The Queen v. Parnell." Now I remind the Committee that those utterances of the Judge were not the final judgment upon any specific point of law raised before him. The charge was a long one, lasting over some hours, and the report which was in the paper was, I believe, never corrected by the Judge himself. It is, no doubt, quite possible to take two or three sentences from a charge of that length and derive a meaning from them which would be entirely different from that which was in the mind of the Judge. It is necessary to look at the whole of the charge, and I contend that the instructions given to the jury by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald and Mr. Justice Barry were precisely similar to that which would have been given by any Judge in England. And it amounts to this—that, if the evidence produced in that case is to be accepted, it is quite sufficient to constitute a criminal conspiracy according to the law of England; and I think if the hon. and learned Member would read the evidence he would, beyond all doubt, come to the conclusion that if that evidence were true the crime of conspiracy had been committed. He has referred to two particular points which were dealt with by the learned Judge. The first was the proposition that if two or more persons combine to do a certain act they might be guilty of criminal conspiracy, although if one person committed the act he would be guilty of no offence whatever. Now I do not think you can find anything in any interpretation of the English Law of Conspiracy which would show that that is not in harmony with the English Law. I am sure the hon. and learned Gentleman will see that if there be a combination among men to make property perfectly useless to the owner, and they determine to carry out the intention so that it shall be useless, the combination ought to be punishable. Therefore it seems to me that the proposition laid down is in entire accordance with English Law. The other point in which the hon. and learned Member found fault with the statement of the learned Judge was that persons might be held to be engaged in a conspiracy with people whose names they did not know and whom they had never seen. Now, I think that is also a proposition for which there will be found to be foundation in the law. I gather from the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman that if the law of Ireland was the same as the law of England his objection to the clause would not exist, or, at all events, not exist to such a degree as it does now. The hon. and learned Member has argued that it was reasonable to insert the clause of the Trades Unions Act of 1875 into this Bill, and there I differ from the hon. and learned Member again, and for the reason that it seems to me that the conditions are essentially different. In a Trade Union dispute the workmen merely combine in reference to a matter prima facie under their control—that is to say, their own labour in the future, whereas here the combination is with regard to something—namely, the land which, as the hon. and learned Member himself has admitted, belongs partly to the landlord. But even on the theory of dual ownership, the tenants' ownership can only exist as long as he fulfils a particular obligation. The combinations in Ireland refer to the land, which, according to the hon. and learned Member's argument belongs to two parties, and the tenants combine together for the purpose of retaining the whole of it for themselves. That seems to make the difference between the two cases complete and to leave no analogy between the case dealt with by the Act of 1875 and the present case. As far as I can judge, the first part of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member is already in our Bill by the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. As far as the 2nd section of the Amendment is concerned, we can say no more than that we define in the Bill the object of the conspiracy, not attempting to codify the means of aiming at such object in any way. Having given our reasons why we cannot admit the Proviso of the hon. and learned Gentleman, I venture to express a hope that the rest of the discussion may be taken as quickly as possible.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): The statement, which has been made by the Attorney General for Ireland by way of answer to my hon. and learned Friend, is that this particular section applies to land and does not apply to work. It must have escaped entirely the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, that one of the very things provided for by the section to which this addition is proposed to be made, is exactly the same as is the subject to which reference has been made, both by the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid) and the Attorney General for Ireland. It is not a question of land alone. The Bill has these words "or not to deal with, work for or hire any person or persons in the ordinary course of trade, business, or occupation."

MR. HOLMES: As far as the law with regard to Trade Unions is concerned, there is a special section in the Bill with reference to that.

MR. WADDY: That is not all the question. What I am endeavouring to point out is, that in order to make an argument against the clause we are told that this is only an Act relating to matters connected with land. That I deny, and say that directly we come to Section 7 of the Appendix, we find it is not to apply to land only, but also to matters of trade. Therefore, I say that the whole argument of the Attorney General for Ireland falls to the ground at once. But this is not the real question; the difficulty we feel, and in respect of which we cannot get any answer, is much broader and wider. It is that this Law of Conspiracy is one of the most objectionable, doubtful, and dangerous branches of our law which we have been endeavouring for years for the purpose of this country and Ireland also to get within due limits, as far as it is possible, to define it. And now you are proposing to establish a new series of offences, and when you establish those offences and bring them within the reach of this exceedingly dangerous branch of law you refuse to define what they are. It is a principle that every penal Statute shall be construed as strictly as possible, and when we ask you to do that, we are told in almost so many words that you really will not do it; that it is not safe, and that you decline to codify the law. No one wants you to codify the law. If you were dealing with the whole law you might say that, but you are here dealing with only part of it. You are now establishing an entirely new set of offences, and when we ask for a clear and definite statement of what these offences are, we cannot get them defined. I wish to point out that the real danger arises very much from the forum before which these matters are to be tried. You have quoted one paragraph from the very learned work of a learned friend of mine, which is cited against us constantly in a very learned fashion—

"But let me remind you that it is true there may be cases in which acts done by several persons under agreement ought to be punished, although the same acts ought not to be punished if done without agreement."

We agree; but the paragraph which follows is one which you seem to forget. It is to the effect, that these offences ought to be specifically and carefully defined. Now this is the one thing which I want to drive home; you will not define the offence; you will not allow these people in Ireland to know when they are in danger; you are going to establish a new jurisdiction of a novel character before which these offences are to be tried, and that is why we call upon you to let them know where they are going wrong. We are told that it is very difficult to codify the law, and yet these extraordinary difficulties are thrown in the way of our carrying out this improvement. We are told by an eminent authority that there is great danger in this law and the working of it, lest the Judge should be tempted to declare it a criminal offence to combine to do anything which is opposed to his political or social views. When we know that this is recognized by trained lawyers and Judges, and when we know that you are going to leave the clause in the hands of Resident Magistrates, then I think it is really too bad, seeing that time after time we have asked you to throw something like a light on the subject, that the Government should say—"You have asked for it before, but we cannot give it." But, inasmuch as this is a new Statute from beginning to end, we shall continue to ask, perhaps in vain, for such information as is necessary for us to understand your Bill, and particularly on behalf of those persons who are to be ruled by it.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): This is one of the Amendments to the Bill which it may be said will divide the sheep from the goats; it will distinguish between those who are prepared to support a measure for putting down crime, and those who are prepared to support a measure for putting down the tenant farmers in Ireland. It is an Amendment which raises a principle incontestable in itself, and which, I venture to say, is one that is not in harmony with the best part of English Law. Mr. Wright's book has often been referred to in the course of this discussion, and I am surprised that the Government have not learned a lesson from that book. Mr.

Wright shows that there is no such thing as Common Law conspiracy in the sense in which Common Law is generally understood; he shows, also, beyond the shadow of doubt, that conspiracy was developed by the Star Chamber, and that it was not a part of the Common Law. This is not the first time that the House of Commons has had before it the subject of conspiracy. It has been before the House on its merits when it was raised without any Party feeling or any sinister object and viewed purely as a question of law. The question was raised by the Conservative Government in 1880, and what were the provisions with regard to conspiracy which the Conservative Government proposed as a codification of the English Law? This will be found in Sections 361-2 of the Criminal Code introduced by Sir John Holker, the Attorney General for England in 1880. Now, these provisions are very remarkable, because they are provisions which are drawn on the line of Mr. Wright's book; they are provisions which are entirely in harmony with this Amendment, and if the Government would accept them in substitution for their criminal clauses in the present Bill, I venture to say there would be very little difficulty in carrying the Bill through the House. Clause 360 of Sir John Holker's Bill provides that everyone is guilty of crime and liable to five years' penal servitude who conspires with any persons to commit any crime punishable with penal servitude. The second clause provides that conspiracy to do what is not punishable with penal servitude shall be visited with a penalty of two years' imprisonment. Beyond these, the only provision was to deal with conspiring to prevent the collection of rates or taxes; everyone was to be guilty of crime, and liable to two years' imprisonment who conspires to prevent the collection of rates and taxes, the levying or collection of which is authorized by law. With that provision also we do not quarrel. These are the things which the Tory Government of 1880 specified in bringing before this House in a codified form, what they considered to be the Law of Conspiracy, and I think they have there an example which they will be doing well to follow in the present case. But they have not done this for a reason which we can all understand, a reason which I have stated to be, that this Bill is not intended to put down crime, but is a Tory measure to aid the landlords in extorting exorbitant rents.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I am sorry to see that the Government are disposed to reply to this Amendment by silence. I can quite understand that there have been Amendments put forward in the course of the Committee stage on this Bill with regard to which the Government would be justified in at once announcing their decision, and asking the Committee to divide upon the question; but this, I think, perhaps, is the most important Amendment which has been moved upon this clause, and possibly the most important Amendment to the clause on the Paper. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland if he would consider this case a little more fully than, perhaps, he has hitherto done, and not ask the Committee to come to a decision simply upon the non possumus of the Attorney General for Ireland? I am not going to discuss the Law of Conspiracy, which has, no doubt, been fully discussed on recent occasions; but it was hardly fair, on the part of the Attorney General for Ireland, to say that this is the same question which has been raised over and over again. I do not think it is. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Hackney (Sir Charles Russell), which was moved with so great ability by him, assumes the law to be what the Attorney General for Ireland says it is; it takes it for granted that the law is the same in Ireland as in England. It is not the argument that the law is to be altered; my hon. and learned Friend says that in England there is a protection afforded against the unjust application of the law in certain cases, and the purpose of this Amendment is to ask that that protection may be afforded in Ireland. We are agreed with reference to the first great principle of the Law of Conspiracy—namely, that it is conspiring unlawfully to do an unlawful thing; that the second is conspiring unlawfully to do a lawful thing; and then there is the third distinction, of which we have heard so much lately—the combination of two or more persons to do a thing which would not be unlawful if done by one singly. We do not dispute the law. I will not argue Judge Fitzgerald's charge; but we say that in England, after a long and protracted struggle, a protection has been given against an unfair application of the Law of Conspiracy to a specific class of persons dealing with their own industry, and we ask that the same protection should be given in Ireland. I would put this case before the Chief Secretary, because it is one which was set up by a great authority on this question. He said, on this question, that the sub-section which was then before the Committee assumed that to be a crime which was not a crime—namely, a combination to effect a breach of contract. Upon that point at the time the whole Liberal agitation turned. The workmen claimed the right to break their contract singly and jointly, and to induce others to do the like, subject only to proceedings which might be taken in a Civil Court. Now that is precisely the case of the tenants in Ireland; they claim the right to break their contract singly, and induce others to do the like. This was the very question afterwards successfully dealt with in the House of Commons by the efforts of the right hon. and learned Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) and the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), and others. The principle was accepted by the Conservative Government, and the legislation was embodied in the Act of 1875. It was admitted on all hands, notably by the Conservative Government, and particularly by Sir Richard Cross, that the law which made breach of contract criminal did not apply as against workmen. We say that the principal, almost the sole, industry in Ireland is the cultivation of land, and that it is just as much a staple as the manufacture of cotton in Lancashire; and iron in Staffordshire, and that the workmen in Ireland are entitled to the same protection in Ireland in respect of their combinations to keep up the value of their labour as the workmen engaged in England in those industries. An hon. Member opposite said the other night that the difference between the two classes was, that in Ireland the men were working with somebody else's property, whereas in England they were working with their own. The Attorney General for Ireland said just now that a man had a right to make what terms he could with reference to his own labour, but that it does not apply to the price which a man pays for the use of land. My hon. and learned Friend pointed to the dual ownership of land in Ireland; but I do not think that that does much to strengthen the case; I think the argument would be as strong without that. I think where you have an industry which cannot be made valuable without the labour of another, it would be right to bring it under this clause. But the question in England was not with regard to the man's own wages, it was with regard to the wages of other people. What was done in England was not to establish the right to protect their own contracts, but the right to induce others to break theirs. The principle of strikes is this—the employer wants to reduce wages; there are always a number of men who are willing to go on at the reduced wages; but the heads of the industry say no, it is the interest of the class that we should not have the wages reduced; and therefore they apply strong measures in their own interests in order to compel their fellow-workmen not to work at the rate of wages which the majority judge to be inimical to the trade. It was under those circumstances that the Legislature stepped in and said that the men should not be punished for the act of combination. Sir James Stephen has well put this case. He said that the Act of 1875 protects all combinations in furtherance of trade disputes, and with respect to such questions, provided positively that no crime should be treated as indictable conspiracy, unless the Act agreed upon would be criminal if done by a single person. That is what Sir James Stephen sums up as the law of this country in reference to trade disputes, and that is what we ask shall be the law in reference to these land disputes in Ireland. If the act is a criminal one between men, let it be criminally dealt with. We do not say a word against that. That is not our meaning; but we do mean that where it is a case of simple combination to break a contract, then we say unless that offence is not criminal if committed by one man, it is unfair and unjust to make it criminal when done by four, five, or 20 men in combination. Now, I ask the Government for a moment to strip this question of a good deal of the prejudice which has been involved in it. I ask the Government to agree that the tenants of Ireland, who work with the raw material of land, should have the same protection which after a long struggle was granted to the workmen in England. The Act of 1875 has been found to work well in this country. There have since that Act was passed been fewer strikes, and a better state of feeling between the employers and workmen; and therefore I hope that the Government will look at this question from a statesmanlike point of view, and not strain the Bill into an instrument of oppression for the enforcement of civil contracts.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR) (Manchester, E.): The circumstances which the right hon. Member has referred to as the reason for the passing of the Act of 1875 are not, in my opinion, analogous to the present position in Ireland. The ground of adoption of the principle of the Act was that, by a series of judgments in Court, and the unfortunate extension of the law in England, the Law of Conspiracy was made to apply in a very harsh manner to the case of the workmen; and what you have to show is that there is some corresponding extension which has been found to be unfair to the tenants of Ireland, and if that were proved to have taken place, there would be something in the contention of the right hon. Gentleman. We say there is no such analogy or extension with regard to the tenants in Ireland; and it is on that ground that we refuse to make this an opportunity for either altering or codifying the Law of Conspiracy. If it had been shown that the Law of Conspiracy had been interpreted either by Irish or English Courts harshly, and was of an oppressive character, then as I have said, there would have been more strength in the argument of the right hon. Gentleman; but there has been no such attempt. I admit we should be most cautious in dealing with the Law of Conspiracy at all; but as we do not attempt that, the right hon. Member must allow us to pursue what we consider to be the expedient course of leaving the Law of Conspiracy as it is, because there has been no adequate reason for engaging in the Herculean task of codification.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I think the right hon. Gentleman is capable of being answered in a single sentence. He said if it were a fact that the Irish Law of Conspiracy had been proved to be as harsh towards the tenants in Ireland as the English Law has been to the workmen in England, that then there ought to be protection given. I take that to be his proposition. But the Law of Conspiracy has not hitherto acted harshly towards the tenants in Ireland, because they have had the protection of trial by jury. Whatever doctrine the Judges may have laid down on this subject, it was necessary that when a harsh interpretation was placed upon the law that it should come before a jury. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that English Judges have put a harsh interpretation on the law, which bore harshly on British artizans. There have been cases of unjust interpretation by the English Judges; and I myself have got those judgments overruled in principle and practice. Well, the doctrine is the same in Ireland. The Irish tenant, up to this time, has had the protection of juries of his own class, which has prevented injustice being done. But we say, if you remove the protection of trial by jury from the Irish tenants, and place the law in the hands not of Resident Magistrates, but at all events, of Judges, without the protection of trial by jury, then you are almost certain to get the same result as you have had in England. That is my answer to the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He said—"Prove me the danger in the past;" but it is not danger in the past that we are dealing with—it is danger in the future, arising out of a specific provision of this Bill, against which we think adequate protection should be given.

MR. A. COHEN (Southwark, W.): I have only one observation to make on the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. I think the hon. and learned Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Waddy) showed that that argument was of a very insufficient validity, because the clause we are now considering is not limited to land at all. If the argument were good for anything, the Attorney General for Ireland ought to be ready to strike out all words except those relating to land. But let me give an example, which I think the Committee will at once see has a most important bearing on the whole Irish Question. Suppose 100 tenants were to agree together that they would not allow anyone to take land from a landlord who has evicted his tenants for non-payment of rent, can any lawyer say that such an agreement would be indictable for conspiracy? I defy any lawyer who has studied the law with great care to say that would be so. That shows the correctness of the view which is stated in Mr. Wright's book; and I say that if the Government have read it, having referred to that book in connection with the 1st clause, they ought to come to the same conclusion at which the author has arrived—that is, that the whole Law of Conspiracy is Judge-made law. I say that when the Legislature is asked to pass a measure which we were informed the other night by the Chief Secretary for Ireland is a permanent measure, and if by that measure it is intended to give the Resident Magistrates in Ireland summary jurisdiction over a certain class of offences, it is the absolute duty of the Legislature to take care that those offences are clearly defined, or that they are only such offences as are known to the English Law, and clearly as ascertainable according to that law. But it is admitted and proved beyond doubt that, according to English Law, it is extremely doubtful what are and what are not indictable conspiracies, and we ask the Government to tell us what they mean. Do they mean to make any conspiracies indictable other than those which are not crimes to-day, because they are not criminally done by individuals? If they say that that is their intention, then they ought to tell us what other specific offences they intend to include; and if that is not their intention—and I do not believe they have quite made up their minds—then they are bound to accept our Amendment.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I gladly accept the challenge of the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour). He said—and I heard him with surprise—that if it could be proved that there had been in Ireland the same harsh exercise of the Law of Conspiracy as was admitted to have taken place in regard to English artizans, he would admit we had a case for this Amendment. I gladly accept the challenge, and I am perfectly astonished that the right hon. Gentleman could make such a challenge in the face of the debates that have taken place. Such a statement coming from the Chief Secretary for Ireland is ample proof of the necessity of repeating some of these matters over and over again. I do not intend to read at any length extracts from the now famous charge of Justice Fitzgerald, which has been so repeatedly referred to in this House; but I must read a couple of passages from that charge. What did Justice Fitzgerald say in regard to the Law of Conspiracy? He said—

"Now, gentlemen, having dealt thus shortly with the information, let me unfold to you what the Law of Conspiracy is, and how it bears on the case."

The case at issue was the combination of the tenants of Ireland to obtain a reduction of rents. Then Justice Fitzgerald gave a definition of conspiracy which has been often quoted. He said—

"If, for instance, a tenant withholds his rent, that is a violation of the right of his landlord to receive it, but it would not be a criminal act, though it would be a violation of a right; but if two or more incite him to do that act, their agreement so to incite him is by the law of the land an offence."

Can anything be more clear or more distinct than that? I maintained the other day, and I repeat now, that that definition of the Law of Conspiracy includes within its scope every single meeting that has been summoned in Ireland, whether in Ulster or Munster, for the purpose of getting a reduction of rent, because there cannot be the slightest doubt that on all those Northern estates, where there was no question of Nationalist organization, the speakers at meetings did incite their brother tenants to withhold their rents for the purpose of getting a reduction. Now, Sir, I noticed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes) attempted in his speech to explain away the charge of Justice Fitzgerald. He endeavoured to water it down, for he said it was very unfair to fix upon certain short extracts from a long charge thus, and pin a Judge to them as an expression of his opinion. Justice Fitzgerald is a man eminently able to distinguish between the different portions of his address; and in the first place, he laid down what the law was, then he proceeded to apply it to the facts of the case. But I do not rest myself there. It has been my fate to have been three times tried in Ireland for criminal conspiracy. The first time I was tried by Justice Fitzgerald, and the charge from which I have quoted was the charge in the case. I was then tried before the Queen's Bench in Dublin by Chief Justice O'Brien, and in that trial I was convicted because there was no jury, and I was sentenced in heavy bail, which the Government failed in estreating, because they were met by the barrier of a jury. But, Sir, in my second trial, before the Queen's Bench, I was convicted of criminal conspiracy. On what charge? On this charge, and no other—that I had incited tenants in Ireland to withhold their rents with the view of getting a reduction. I tried to put in the plea of justification on account of intent; but Chief Justice O'Brien, and, subsequently, Justice Murphy, declared they would allow no evidence bearing on the intent, as the intent was nothing to the point. They precluded me from examining witnesses as to my intent. Chief Justice O'Brien took up the charge of Justice Fitzgerald and made it the basis of his judgment. He said that was a definition of the Law of Conspiracy laid down by one of the most distinguished of the Irish Judges; it had become classical, and would become an authority in all future cases. That was my second experience of the Law of Conspiracy in Ireland, and I admit I approach the consideration of this case from a totally different point of view from that from which it has been discussed for the last half-hour. I am not a lawyer, but, I am sorry to say, I am learned in the application of the law. My third trial was before Justice Murphy, so I have the widest experience of the views of the Irish Judges. Now, what occurred at my third trial? Justice Murphy pursued precisely the same course as Chief Justice O'Brien—he quoted the charge of Justice Fitzgerald, said that charge had now become classical, and was a definition of the law in which all Irish Judges would in future go when trying cases of conspiracy. He said that on the one issue whether I had incited tenants to withhold their rents with a view of getting a reduction, I was guilty of the crime of conspiracy, and he distinctly directed the jury to convict. What saved me was the same thing that has saved many men, and nullified the Law of Seditious Libel in this country—namely, the moral sense of the jury. Although the jury were not farmers, they refused to take the definition of the law from the Judge, and they decided that I was not guilty of any crime. It is monstrous for the Government to argue as if they are simply leaving the law as it stands. What did the Chief Secretary for Ireland say? He said he declined to attempt to define the Law of Conspiracy. "We think we are justified in leaving the law as it stands to be interpreted by a competent tribunal." Those were the words of the Chief Secretary for Ireland—"to be interpreted by a competent tribunal." That is to say, that this law, which has exercised the greatest Judges of England, which has been matter of the highest controversy in this House for years, is to be relegated for its interpretation to a bench of Irish magistrates, and this House, which did not hesitate, when called upon in the interests of English working men, to override and reverse the decisions of the most learned lawyers in England, now hesitates to place any limit or restriction upon the jurisdiction of these competent tribunals in Ireland, to whom the unfortunate tenant-farmers are to be handed over. Now, Sir, the Chief Secretary for Ireland dwelt with great force on what he considered to be the fact—that there is no analogy between the case of the Irish tenant farmer and the case of the English artisan. I completely and absolutely deny that any man has a right to make such a statement. No analogy! I fail to see how there can be analogy between any two cases unless there is between these two. Strongly as the case was put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Henry H. Fowler) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), they failed to put it as strongly as it can be put. Why is it that a demand was made in England for the protection of men labouring for wages only? Because your farmers are capitalists; they employ labour with their capital, and therefore the demand for protection for their employment came from the labouring men. What is the analogy which is absolutely strict? It is that four-fifths of the farmers of Ireland are absolutely working men, earning wages out of the land. Well, if they are deprived of that land they are reduced to beggary and starvation. And allow me to remind the Chief Secretary for Ireland what this comes to—what the application of such theories comes to. It comes to this—that the fact is, men are legislating for a country the conditions of whose population they are unacquainted with. Let the Chief Secretary for Ireland come down to East Mayo, where there is, practically speaking, no wage-earning population, and he will see the absurdity of saying that the same protection should not be afforded to the tenant farmers of Ireland as is afforded to the labourers of England. They accuse us of exciting these people to hold other men's property while refusing to pay for it. Have the landlords not got their legal rights? Have we incited, in a single instance, the farmers of Ireland to resist by force of arms, or by force of any kind, the enforcement of legal rights? Nothing of the sort. The legal remedy is always open to the landlord, and he can, by legal process, recover possession of his property; and, therefore, it is monstrously untrue to say we incite these people to hold another man's property; and in the end the landlord, under the law as it stands at present, can get a great deal more than his just rights. If the tenant refuses to pay an exorbitant rent, the landlord can not only take back his property, but he can also take from the tenant the whole of his property, and that is what is being done in Ireland every day. It is a monstrously illusory argument to tell us the tenants of Ireland are holding other men's property because they do not of their own free wills walk out of their farms. They remain in possession of their holdings, but the landlords have a tremendous remedy by which they can recover their property—a remedy they have shown they are not slow to use. It remains for the Government to tell us on what real and substantial grounds they deny that the tenants of Ireland stand in precisely the same position to the general population of Ireland as the artisans of this country do to the general population of England. It remains for the Government to tell us on what ground they refuse to the tenants of Ireland the same protection they have given to the artisans of England. In my opinion, the Irish tenant has a stronger case for protection than the artisan of England, because the latter is free to go and labour where he likes—he carries his fortune at his fingers' ends; but the poor tenant of Ireland is chained to the one spot of earth, not only by sentimental feelings—which are enormously strong—but by property, which he must leave behind and be robbed of if he leaves the spot. His position is much more defenceless and weaker than that of the artizan of England, and, therefore, I say he deserves greater protection under these circumstances. I utterly fail to understand on what grounds the Government persist in their present position. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland distinctly stated that if we could show that this harsh assertion of the Law of Conspiracy had been made against the Irish tenants he would admit we had a strong case. I contend that we have fully shown the fact to him, and now I earnestly ask him to give a reason why he should persist in rejecting this Amendment. There is only one other point I desire to refer to. I am not sure whether it was the Chief Secretary for Ireland or the Attorney General for Ireland who said the supporters of this Amendment had overlooked the provision protecting trades unions in Ireland. Why do you need to protect trades unions by a special provision if this Act is not to deprive Irish farmers of the rights you have secured to English labour? The very existence of that provision is the condemnation of this clause; it is a declaration that by this Act you mean to say that the tenant farmers of Ireland—the small tenant farmers of Ireland who constitute four-fifths of the population—are inferior beings, not fit to stand on the same footing as their English bretheren, and it is by that declaration alone you will see the condemnation of your Act in the eyes of the working men of this country.

MR. A. J. WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I have listened with the greatest interest to the whole of this debate, and desire to address a few words to the Committee. A great deal has been said of the book which has been written by Mr. Wright upon the Law of Conspiracy. I cannot help thinking that the book has been more referred to than read. I have, whilst the debate has proceeded, carefully read and re-read that admirable work, and endeavoured to realize exactly how the matter stands with reference to this branch of English jurisprudence. It seems to me the arguments in this case have too technical a character. Let me try to present the state of affairs as far as this particular section is concerned. As Mr. Wright points out, the whole of this branch of the Criminal law is Judge-made—it is exclusively the product of the judicial mind. Excellent as judicial legislation has been with reference to Commercial Law, unfortunately, in dealing with Criminal Law we always find that the judicial mind is rather in favour of arbitrary treatment. The state of the law with reference to combination is this—First of all we have combinations to do what, if done by one person, would be lawful, by means which would be lawful. It is agreed on all hands that such combinations are lawful. Then we have agreements by workmen not to work except on certain terms; and here I come to the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) which seems to me to be utterly opposed to the principles of criminal jurisprudence with reference to combination. As I understand the law laid down by Mr. Wright, it is not the Common Law, and never has been the Common Law of this country, that combinations by workmen not to work except upon certain terms are illegal. The trade combinations which have been referred to were made distinctly illegal by old Statutes, and it was based upon these old Statutes that our Judges directed juries to convict. It was in consequence of the decisions in these cases that the Masters and Servants' Act of 1875 was passed. It is distinctly stated in Mr. Wright's book that all combinations of this kind were perfectly legal, with the single exception of the combination of the trades union. I will upon this point give an authority which is highly respected in this House—the authority of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James). In the debate upon the Masters and Servants' Act, in 1873, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said—

“In punishing what the law called conspiracy we were punishing what working-men called combination. They were bound to combine, and their experience was that without combination all attempts to improve their condition were hopeless. The gas stokers were punished because admitting their right to combine, they had combined to break a contract, and because under Section 14 of the Master and Servant Act that was a criminal offence. It would not have been criminal on the part of any other subject of the Realm, but it was criminal in them."—(3 Hansard, [2:6] 607.)

So much for legal combinations by workmen or others to improve their position. Now we come to the combinations which are distinctly criminal. A criminal combination to do something is either to do something which is criminal or to do something which is perfectly legal by criminal means. It is only the intermediate class, a very large and varied class of combinations, which is left at large under this section, and which we, on this side of the House, say should be clearly defined. I am quite willing to admit that there is the greatest difference between the dicta in reference to this class of cases of learned Judges on this side, and learned Judges on the other side of the Irish Channel. I wish to be perfectly fair, because it is very important we should realize the true bearings of the case. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) has mentioned some cases. Perhaps the Committee will bear with me while I mention one or two cases in corroboration of this view—

"A conspiracy to injure a man in his private property, a conspiracy to prevent all customers coming to his shop, what is that but a civil injury? A conspiracy to injure two men combining to interfere with a man's civil right is indictable."

What does Mr. Wright say in reference to that dictum of Mr. Justice Erle? "It is conceived," says Mr. Wright—

"That these expressions, for the most part only amounting to a question or a doubt are not sufficient to establish exceptions to the principles involved in the decisions given before."

Namely, that a combination to injure is not criminal unless criminal means be used. Now, Mr. Courtney, it is precisely this class of case in which it is admitted on the Treasury Bench that the act is not, per se, in itself illegal, but in which something may be done which may possibly be injurious or unlawful, that we are asked to deliberately withdraw from the only safeguard which, for generations, has preserved the humbler classes in this country from the injustice which would have been done them if these dicta had not been actually withstood by juries. I was greatly surprised to hear the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Richard Webster) say he thought two of the Irish Resident Magistrates were better than 12 jurymen in England or in Ireland. I am sure Liberal Members do not wish to make any reflection upon the competency of the Resident Magistrates of Ireland; but I think every sensible man will admit that these questions of nicety and delicacy, involving the greatest Constitutional consequences, are questions which should not be withdrawn from juries. I quite agree with my right hon. and learned Friends that if we must have this odious Act the Government ought at least to define the criminal acts which they are going to create.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Mr. Courtney, I desire to say a very few words in support of the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. R. T. Reid). I think that no one can read the remarks of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald in the Parnell case without coming to the conclusion that he goes very far beyond any decision of English Judges in similar cases, that he has laid down a doctrine which goes very far beyond the Law of Conspiracy as defined in any of the law books or decisions of English Judges, and without questioning the law of that learned Judge, I cannot but think it would be very desirable that his ruling should be revised by the Superior Court, either the Superior Court of Ireland or the Supreme Court of England—namely, the House of Lords. At present, the ruling of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald must be taken as conclusive, and it is absolutely certain that that ruling will be accepted as the law by the Resident Magistrates in Ireland. Well, now there will be no appeal under the clause before us, if it is passed in its present shape, except to a single Judge—namely, the Judge of the County Court. There will be no possibility of appeal from the Resident Magistrate to the higher tribunals of Ireland, or even of England. It will be quite possible when this clause is passed into law that the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) may be summoned before a magistrate and committed to prison for six months for merely recommending tenants to combine for a reduction of rent. It is quite possible that anybody in the position of the hon. Member may be summoned before one of the Resident Magistrates in

Mr. A. J. Williams

Ireland and sentenced to prison for six months with hard labour, without the possibility of his appealing to the higher tribunals of either Ireland or England. That would be a great scandal, one of the greatest scandals possible in the country. It is surely very undesirable any such thing should take place. For my part, I think that the case of the small tenants of Ireland for protection is even a stronger one than that of the labourers of England, because they have an interest in the property of the holdings in respect of which the dispute arises; and having that interest it is most important that they should be put in a position in which they can freely combine for the purpose of obtaining just rents in respect of their holdings. The clause which is now before us prevents them having that free power of combination, and it is for that reason I most strongly oppose it, and earnestly hope the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. R. T. Reid) will be passed. I have put a question to the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes); but as yet neither he nor any Member of the Government has ventured to answer it. I put this question—Suppose 50 or 60 small tenants in Ireland, feeling themselves unjustly treated in regard to rent, combine together, and four or five of the leading men summon the tenants together and advise them to strike against their rents, will the four or five men be liable to be summoned, under the clause as it stands, before a Resident Magistrate, and to be convicted and sent to prison with hard labour? No answer has as yet been given from the Government Bench to that question, and I presume, therefore, it cannot be answered; because under this clause, as it stands, it will be possible to commit these men to prison. I say that is a position precisely similar to that of the labourers of England before the Act of 1875; and if the analogy holds good, as I believe it does, we ought to give the same protection to the tenants of Ireland as we have given to the labourers of England under the Act of 1875. There is no law in any country in Europe in which a similar Law of Conspiracy exists. Even in India people cannot be convicted of conspiracy under such conditions. I maintain that the law of Europe and of India is opposed to the clause now before us, and, therefore, I hope the Committee will agree with the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I must say the conduct of hon. Gentlemen opposite is not, in my judgment, calculated to shorten discussion. Mr. Courtney, this is a Bill you would not apply to niggers, and yet you mean to apply it to Irishmen; and when that right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre)—a Privy Counsellor, an ex-Cabinet Minister—refers to the fact that hon. Members of this House may get certain imprisonment, hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite, who weep over a wounded land-grabber, and who groan in spirit if the tail of a cow is cut off, think it is calculated to promote discussion in this House by gloating beforehand over the action of their Resident Magistrates. Now, let me say that, whatever this House of Commons may do, whatever hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway may think, and whatever Rules you may enforce, we will fight you as long as we can sit on these Benches. I tell hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway who, in a half-drunken condition, try to howl us down—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. and learned Gentleman must be more respectful to the House than use language of that kind. [Ministerial cries of "Withdraw!"] It would greatly assist the Chair if hon. Gentlemen would not proffer their assistance by cries of "Withdraw!"

MR. T. M. HEALY: Mr. Courtney, I bow to your ruling under any circumstances—

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I rise to Order, Mr. Courtney. I wish to ask you if the hon. Gentleman should not withdraw that expression?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Mr. Healy.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would respect a ruling made by you, Sir, under any circumstances. If it will please hon. Gentlemen opposite I will withdraw the expression; but I must say we will not sit here and be howled down by hon. Gentlemen opposite when the liberties of our country are under discussion. No matter what the consequences or what the penalty may be, so long as we are here we will protest against this Bill. If you howl us down you must take the consequences. I know no Assembly in Europe where conduct such as that of hon. Gentlemen opposite would be tolerated for a moment. We are here in a minority, it is true; but we are fighting for the liberty of our country, and for hon. Members who call themselves Gentlemen—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. T. M. HEALY: When we are dealing with one of the most important, abstruse, and delicate questions that ever came before any country, are we going to have our men howled down by men who have not even taken the trouble to read the Bill, who know nothing about it—who are, in fact, absolutely incompetent to pronounce an opinion upon it? I say it is a public scandal, and I tell them that, whatever the consequences may be, it is not by howling that they will pass this Bill. Now, Sir, we have to sit here while they are away at dinner. We have to argue these points while they are indicting letters, possibly denouncing us to The Times. Let any one of them put his finger upon some particular portion of the debate, and say this is irrelevant or that is irrelevant, and not deal with us by a system of howling which has become a disgrace to them and the country they belong to.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 180; Noes 263: Majority 83.—(Div. List, No. 166.)

THE CHAIRMAN: The decision just arrived at disposes of the next two Amendments.

MR. MARUM (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to move to insert after "Law" in line 22—

"Provided, That no agreement or combination shall amount to any such criminal conspiracy unless some act, other than such agreement or combination, be done to affect the object thereof by one or more of the parties to such agreement or combination."

I do not propose to travel over the ground which has been covered by previous Amendments. My Amendment simply provides that a person shall be guilty of some act other than the act of entering into an agreement before he shall be said to have engaged in a criminal conspiracy. The provision I propose is to be found in the American Code.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 22, after "Law" insert "Provided that no agreement or combination shall amount to any such criminal conspiracy unless some Act, other than such agreement or combination, be done to effect the object thereof by one or more of the parties to such agreement or combination."—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. HOLMES) (Dublin University): This Amendment would introduce a change in the law, for which we have got no precedent in this country, nor, as far as I am aware, has it been suggested in any code or by any authority that such a change should be made in this country. I hope, therefore, the hon. Member will not press the Amendment to a Division.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): The right hon. and learned Gentlemen has admitted that this Amendment would introduce a change in the law, because an overt act may be done in coming to—in producing an agreement, and that overt Act, without producing an agreement, would be quite sufficient evidence of conspiracy; but without entering in the slightest degree into the advisability of introducing the change, he refused to support this Amendment on the ground that there was no precedent whatsoever in any code or elsewhere for a provision requiring an overt act other than the Act which creates the agreement for which conspiracy could be charged. On that point, I think I can refer him to the existing Code of Indian Law which bears out the principle which this Amendment seeks to introduce. If he would be good enough to refer to Act 45 of the Governor General of India, passed in the year 1860, and if he looks at the 5th chapter of that Act, Sections 178 and 179, he would find it laid down that an offence or offences constituting conspiracy may be conspiracy followed up by an overt act; and in Sections 107 and 108, that no conviction for conspiracy can be had unless conspiracy and some overt act have been shown. But I might point out further, that the Indian Law not only supports this Amendment, but it absolutely goes on to provide that no conspiracy shall be punishable unless either by means or by object that conspiracy tends to the commission of an offence which would be a crime if committed. That Indian Code, the law governing millions of Her Majesty's subjects, maintains the very principle of my Amendment of my Bill to introduce. It has been in India since 1860, 28 years; and I think such a principle should be in Ireland.

MR. O'DOHERT
The Committee will act is not an act to be charged with an offence which my hon. Friend upon the crime, as laid by the Resident Magistrate as conspiracy as has been an act or an attempt to effect the conspiracy which that is not much of a change in the words learned Gentleman. A change in the definition of Conspiracy if we were to change the Law of Conspiracy; is doing is defining the Conspiracy which is the Resident Magistrate. We seek to put a law which seeks to put one conspiracy that is to be defined by Resident Magistrates, in the mouth of the right Gentleman to say seeking a change in law. The Government is responsible for this; they choose deliberately the word "conspire," which has been changed, or rather altered, and they have put it in the mouth of the Resident Magistrate, and surely it is little to be taken part in should something which he is least, as either to attempt to induce an attempt to induce should have been taken part in if a Resident Magistrate has gone to tenants in a small town, they should apply to a reduction of rent, say—"Yes, we should not pay our rent,"—that is a Resident Magistrate who is a conspiracy, yet no act number of Members in the House to enable the Government to do that.

MR. MARUM (Kilkenny, N.): The right hon. Gentleman must bear in mind that it takes two days for Irish Members to go to and return from Ireland.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I announced that the Bill would be taken on Monday, and I am afraid I cannot draw back from that announcement, having regard to the convenience of hon. Gentlemen generally. I propose, however, not to take the Bill on Monday fortnight, that is to say, on the 6th June, but to take Supply instead. The object of hon. Gentlemen will thus be secured in some measure, and I trust that arrangement will meet with satisfaction. Perhaps I am hardly in order in going further. ["Go on."] Well, Sir, with the permission of the House I wish to say that on Monday the 6th June it is proposed to take Supply, the Budget Bill later, and subsequently the National Debt Bill. ["What Supply?"] In accordance with an arrangement made with the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Post Office Estimates will be taken first, and then in the ordinary course, Class I of the Civil Service Estimates.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when all the Papers relating to the Whiteboy Acts will be in the hands of hon. Members. We are now coming near that portion of the Bill which deals with the Whiteboy Acts, and the putting down of Amendments will be rendered very difficult unless we know what the charges under these Acts are.

MR. W. H. SMITH: We will give the House full information before we arrive at that portion of the Bill which refers to the Whiteboy Acts. Any assistance which the House requires for the discussion of these Acts will certainly be given.

MR. CHANCE: I understand no progress will be made with the Crimes Bill on Tuesday next—at the Morning Sitting on Tuesday.

MR. W. H. SMITH: That is the intention of the Government. The Bill will be put down for Monday and will be taken on Monday, and I hope, notwithstanding the anticipation of the hon. Gentleman, that considerable progress will be made with it. We shall then adjourn consideration of the Bill until Tuesday the 7th June.

Mr. Chance

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

DUKE OF CONNAUGHT'S LEAVE BILL.—[BILL 228.]

(Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Secretary Stanhope, Sir John Gorst.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Sir John Gorst.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to ask the Government a question upon this Bill. I offer no opposition in the world to the Duke of Connaught's leave; but it seems to me the Government might take this opportunity of making that slight change in the law for the benefit of other officers which was discussed on the second reading of the Bill. There will be no trouble in passing the Bill in reference to the Duke of Connaught; but I would respectfully point out that it would be the most simple thing in the world to change the title of the Bill and call it something like the Leave of Absence from India Bill, and thus prevent it from having the invidious appearance of being passed simply for the convenience of the Duke of Connaught. I do not think it fair to pass an Act which seems to raise an invidious distinction; and to put in a clause dealing with officers generally would look fairer all round.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir John Gorst) (Chatham): The matter is not so simple as it appears. It is now under consideration, and I hope in the present Session that a measure may be submitted to Parliament for dealing with the question. To attempt to do it now would, I think, involve matters which, at all events, would cause delay; and it is a matter which ought not to be dealt with without full consideration.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Upon this clause I wish to say, Sir, that we have an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that the Duke of Connaught will not receive any pay during the period of his leave. I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether that applies only to Indian pay or generally?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH) (Strand, Westminster): It refers to his pay as Commander-in-Chief of the Bombay Army. It does not, of course, affect any regimental pay, which he would have under any circumstances, whether he was in command or not in command. The engagement is that all his pay and all his allowances, in reference to his position as Commander-in-Chief of the Bombay Army, will be suspended the moment he leaves his command until he returns to it.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I presume the Duke of Connaught will pay his own expenses in coming home?

MR. W. H. SMITH: That, also, is understood.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Sir John Gorst.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: I simply wish to ask a question with reference to the next Business on the Paper—namely, what Bills it is proposed by the Government to take to-night?

MR. W. H. SMITH: We propose to take the East India Stock Conversion Bill, the Truro Bishopric Bill, and the Public Parks and Works (Metropolis) Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

EAST INDIA STOCK CONVERSION

BILL.—[BILL 267.]

(Sir John Gorst, Mr. Jackson.)

CONSIDERATION. THIRD READING.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Sir John Gorst.)

MR. SPEAKER: As this Bill, which is technically speaking a Money Bill, provides no charge, but on the contrary, effects a saving, I shall under these circumstances, make no objection so far as I am concerned to the next stage being taken.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I am entirely in favour of this Bill being taken; but, at the same time, I am always at a loss to know why it was regarded as a Money Bill, and why the block did not affect it. I always understood a Money Bill to be a Bill which made a charge on the taxpayers. I am at a loss to know under what possible circumstances a Bill like this should ever be considered a Money Bill. I think it a most unfortunate thing that we should have this extension of the Money Bill principle. We had another instance in a Bill dealing with the Irish Constabulary, which was called a Money Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC PARKS AND WORKS (METROPOLIS) BILL.—[BILL 136.]

(Mr. David Plunket, Mr. Jackson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): I am extremely glad that I have at last obtained the opportunity of asking the House to give a second reading to this Bill, and I hope there will be no opposition to it. At the same time, I feel it is right that I should very briefly state to the House what the object of the Bill is, and what it is proposed to do. The object of this Bill is to give effect to a promise which was given last year when the Estimates were being discussed, and when considerable objection was taken to a continuance of the payment of the expenses of the Parks of the Metropolis by the taxpayers of the country. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), amongst others, objected strongly to this, and there was a Division adverse to the Vote on that occasion—that is to say, adverse to the maintenance of the Parks at the cost of the taxpayers. On a subsequent occasion, it was agreed that the Vote would not be opposed, as to the Parks which are known as Royal Parks, on a pledge being given that the other Parks were excluded from the Vote, and accordingly a Bill was brought in last year for the purpose of giving effect to that pledge.

Unfortunately, that Bill miscarried, and did not become an Act of Parliament; and this year, as early as we could, the Bill which I have now to ask a second reading for was introduced in this House. The objects of the Bill are, very shortly, as follows. They are to transfer certain Parks and other works to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and to provide that in future they shall be maintained at the expense of the ratepayers of the Metropolis, instead of at the expense of the taxpayers of the country. The Parks and the works which it is proposed to transfer in this way are set out in the Schedule of this Bill, and they are Victoria Park, Battersea Park, Kennington Park, Bethnal Green, Westminster Bridge, and the Thames Embankment at Chelsea. These are the Parks and works which it is proposed by this Bill to transfer to the Metropolitan Board of Works, so that in future the expense of maintaining them shall be borne by the ratepayers of the Metropolis, and no longer by the taxpayers of the Kingdom. I do not know that the principle of this Bill will be disputed in any quarter of the House; but I know that objections have been taken to the fact that one of these Parks—that is to say, Battersea Park—is charged with a considerable sum of money—a sum of £133,000 of debt. But, on the other hand, we propose in this Bill to transfer to the Metropolitan Board of Works along with this debt an estate which at the present time produces £4,500 a-year from ground rents, and which will, we believe, in a few years produce the much larger sum of £6,800 a-year. We believe that this would not be a bad bargain for the Metropolitan Board of Works to make. At the same time, as I have informed the House, in answer to Questions which have been put to me on the subject, if those who represent the interests of the Metropolitan Board of Works should prefer to have it in the other way—that is to say, that we should simply hand over the Battersea Park to the Metropolitan Board of Works, discharged of the debt, and without the estate, we should amend the Bill in that way, and the natural result would be as follows:—that is to say, we keep the estate from which a very large income is derived, and we keep the debt; but we hand over the Park without the estate and without the debt. We believe that the way in which it is proposed by the Bill—that is to say, to give the Park with the debt to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the estate which produces the income I have mentioned—would not be a bad bargain for the Metropolitan Board of Works. On the other hand, if they prefer to take the other way—to take over the Park without the debt, and without the estate which produces the income I have mentioned, we shall not resist such an Amendment if it is proposed. Therefore, the Metropolitan Board of Works will have its own way. I have only to state that the natural result of the Bill will then be as follows. There will be properties transferred which, in order to place them in their present position, would involve a capital expenditure of £493,500, against an annual expenditure of £19,300—that is to say, an annual expenditure for keeping up and maintaining these works. I do not know that the House would wish me at the present time to go through more particularly the section of the Bill. I think I have stated generally the provisions of the Bill, and when we come to discuss the matter in Committee, it can be more fully gone into. Sir, I hope that on the present occasion the House will allow the second reading of this Bill. I move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Plunket.)

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG (Middlesex, Hornsey): I do not wish in any way to oppose my right hon. Friend's Motion; but I must say that I am taken very considerably at a disadvantage. I did not think that this Bill would be brought on just now, and it is my misfortune that I have not brought any notes down to the House with me. With regard to what advantage the Metropolitan ratepayers may get, I may just remark this—that it is rather hard on the ratepayers of the Metropolis to say they get a very good bargain. I should like to ask my right hon. Friend whether he would accede to the Motion I have put down, that this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. [Mr. PLUNKET indicated assent.] Very well, that being so, I think I shall not waste the time of the House, but agree to the second reading of the Bill, on the understanding that it shall be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. PLUNKET: I have no objection to that course.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): Before the Bill is disposed of in the very agreeable manner suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James McGarel-Hogg), I think there should be an expression of opinion from the general body of the House as to the position in which the whole question stands. I may point out that parks are not peculiar to London. There is now hardly a town of any magnitude or enterprise in the United Kingdom which is not provided with parks quite as large in proportion as those in the Metropolis. Now, Sir, what are the means out of which these parks have been provided? Unless it be by the private munificence of individuals, there is only one method available whereby the ratepayers can provide themselves with the necessary funds. Recourse is had to the practice of borrowing on the rates of the town, and the ratepayers are made liable for the repayment of principal and interest. I suppose it will scarcely be contended in any part of the House that these parks are worth the money that they have cost; and if the whole charge of the London Parks was thrown upon the Metropolis, the Metropolis would be in precisely the same position as any other town or city in the United Kingdom wishing to provide itself with similar advantages. No doubt the error in the past has been that Parliament has taken upon itself to provide the Metropolis, free of charge, with these enormous advantages. But, fortunately, the representatives of the general taxpayers of the country have risen to protest against a continuance of the practice. I do not see any necessity why an estate to the value of £178,000 should be handed over to the Metropolis in order to induce the Metropolis to take over these Parks. What is the fund to which the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) refers? I suppose it is really now a national estate; and, because Parliament is handing over to the Metropolis property which is costing the Board £493,000, I do not see any necessity for the additional gift of an estate now bringing in over £4,000 a-year, and which will shortly be bringing in over £7,000 a-year. It is true that these Parks will require an annual charge on the Metropolis for their maintenance; but there is no peculiarity in that. There is an annual charge on every Provincial Park in the country, and I do not see why the Metropolis should have exceptional privileges in this respect. After the transfer of these Parks and the annual charges in relation thereto, there will still remain several Parks in London in regard to which the Metropolis will enjoy exclusive advantages, and in regard to which the annual charge will remain upon the taxation of the country at large. The Metropolis has the exclusive benefit of the Royal Parks, and I do not see why the cost of their maintenance should be a general charge upon the taxpayer. The ownership of the Royal Parks might remain with the State as at present; but, so long as they are for the sole benefit of the Metropolis, I think the least that can be done is to make the Metropolis liable for their maintenance. I do not hesitate to say that any other city in this country would be only too pleased to take over any public property on the same conditions. At any rate, as representing a Provincial constituency, I wish to enter my protest against handing over this additional estate in order to sweeten the gift to the Metropolis.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I do not propose to move the Amendment of which I have given Notice, because I am of opinion that the suggestion of the right hon. Member for the Hornsey Division of Middlesex (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) will answer the purpose I had in view. I wish, as a Metropolitan Member, to protest against additional burdens being placed upon the ratepayers of the Metropolis in consequence of what was little else than a snap Division taken at an unreasonable hour last Session. The ratepayers of London are already notoriously overburdened, and I think it is hard, under these circumstances, that they should be made responsible for additional charges. If new burdens are to be imposed on the ratepayers in London, I think any fund so raised might be applied to the purpose of obtaining new open spaces for the benefit of the poor. It must be remembered that the circumstances of London are entirely different from those of most of the Provincial towns. I venture to submit to the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) that in the case of any ordinary Provincial town the ratepayers are within easy reach of the suburbs, and are not called upon to find any rates to keep up those suburbs. Even in the larger Provincial towns the poor are not so entirely shut out from access to the suburbs as they are in London. I took part only last week in the opening of a recreation ground in the borough which I have the honour to represent. This recreation ground is at a considerable distance from any one of the existing Metropolitan Parks, and it was universally agreed on that occasion that until this open space was provided, the poor of the neighbourhood were absolutely precluded from taking advantage of those green spaces which are the lungs of London. I trust that Members who sit for Provincial constituencies will consider the peculiar circumstances of the ratepayers and of the poor of London; and that they will, at any rate, consent to the very moderate proposal of my right hon. Friend the Member for the Hornsey Division of Middlesex (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg), that this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): Speaking as one of the Metropolitan Liberal Members, I may say that, inasmuch as the Government have consented to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, I have no intention of opposing the second reading. I do not quite understand the drift of the remarks of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth). Either we have no right to be burdened with the cost of Battersea Park, or if we have a right to be so burdened we have a right to any source of income which appertains to it. The estate to which reference has been made distinctly belongs to Battersea Park, and I, for one, shall fight against any proposal to throw the charge on the rates, unless we also have the estate or some equivalent for it. I should also like to point out that London is in an entirely different position from Provincial towns in reference to the control which the ratepayers exercise over local affairs. If the Metropolis had the same kind of municipal authority as Bradford or Manchester, we might be more ready to assume responsibilities of this kind. I do not intend to trouble the House further at this late hour of the evening, except to say that I hope the ratepayers of London will be given an opportunity of expressing their views before the Select Committee suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central); I entirely agree with the principle of this Bill; and I should like to know whether, under the terms of the Reference to a Select Committee, it will be open to the Metropolitan Board of Works to object to that principle? If so, I shall strongly oppose such Reference. If it is proposed to refer the Bill to a Select Committee for the consideration of details, assuming the principle to have been agreed upon by this House, then I shall have no objection to the course proposed. With regard to the suggestion of my hon. Friend and Colleague the Member for West Bradford (Mr. Illingworth), that the Metropolitan Board of Works should be charged to the original cost of these Parks, or at all events, should not, on the other hand, take the estate which the Government proposed to transfer to the Parks, I cannot agree with him. No doubt, by this Bill we are going to impose a burden of a considerable character upon the Metropolitan Board; but my hon. Friend does not recollect, or does not know, that the City of London does not receive its contribution of half the cost of its police. If the Metropolis had its local government, the same as Provincial towns, that contribution would have to be paid; and the amount would not be far short of the charge we are now imposing. Another question that occurs to me is, whether this would not be a good opportunity for handing over to the Metropolitan Board that very inconvenient property—Brompton Cemetery. It is obvious that the income of that cemetery will drop through before long, and some authority ought to be in a position to buy land to replace it when it is filled. I cannot but think that this would be a good opportunity for settling the question on a more satisfactory basis.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I wish to ask whether it would be competent for the Committee, if appointed, to take into consideration the excising from the Schedule of any of the Parks, or the adding of parks which are not included in the Schedule? The constituency which I represent includes Wimbledon Common, an open space dedicated to the public at large; but the expense of maintaining which is borne entirely by the district of which it is a part. If this Bill is passed in the form in which it is proposed, it will have the effect of throwing upon my constituency a portion of the maintenance of the parks scheduled, in addition to the burden we now have to bear in respect of Wimbledon Common. It seems to me that we have an equitable right to set off the special burdens already imposed upon us by legislation affecting the Common against the charge which the Bill would throw upon us in regard to the Parks generally, and if we are not to be admitted before the Committee to raise this case, I shall feel it my duty to oppose the measure. The Bill has taken its rise from an objection urged in the time of the late Government to two or three Votes for the expense of the maintenance of these Parks; and it seems to me that when it is committed, powers ought to be given to the Committee for the consideration of special circumstances affecting any particular part of the Metropolis.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I think the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Kimber) and the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Kensington (Sir Roper Lethbridge) are not quite accurate in their historical recollection of this question. They assumed that when the question was raised in Parliament in 1885, that was the first occasion on which this matter had been raised, and that it was the decision of that evening which has produced this change of policy on the part of the Government. It was nothing of the sort. This question has been raised for many years in the House of Commons on the Estimates, and there has been a growing feeling year after year that the time has arrived when London ought to defray the cost of its own Parks in the same manner as Liverpool, Manchester, and the other large towns of the Kingdom defray the cost of their Parks. The question was not decided on a snatch

Division. I was responsible for the Vote on that occasion, and I believe it was one of the largest Divisions that has ever taken place in Supply. Moreover, the feeling in the House was so strong, that they not only rejected the Votes for the ordinary London Parks, but attempted to put pressure on the Government in the same way in reference to the Royal Parks. It was impossible to assent to the rejection of the Vote for the Royal Parks, as that would have been a breach of the contract made with Her Majesty when she ascended the Throne; but the Government only obtained the Vote on the distinct pledge that the cost of what might be called the London Parks proper should be thrown upon the rate-payers of London. London is not only the wealthiest city in this Empire, but one of the lowest rated. The burden proposed to be put on the Metropolitan Board of Works is one-sixth of a penny. Now, I ask any hon. Gentleman who represent English, or Scotch, or Irish municipalities if they know of any Park which is kept up at a cost of one-sixth of a penny? I think the proposition of the Government is fair and just, and I think the good sense of the Metropolitan Members will cause them to see that the time has come when this burden should be put upon the proper shoulders. I agree that there are matters of detail connected with the Bill which a Select Committee is the proper tribunal to deal with, and I would go further and say that the position of the Battersea Debt and Estate is also a question for the Committee; but I object strongly to the question of public policy involved in the Preamble of the Bill being referred to a Select Committee of five Members. That is a question of Government policy. Two administrations have now declared in this House that the time has arrived for transferring the cost of these Parks from the State to the Metropolis; and it should be distinctly understood that in assenting to this Motion for a Select Committee we are only assenting to the reference to the Committee of the details by which this scheme can be carried out.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): The position in which we stand in the North of London is that we are farther from the Parks than most people. I look, however, upon the maintenance of the Parks as a matter of local taxation, and I think London is rich enough to pay for its own Parks. At the present time, when all parts of the country are overburdened with taxation, we in London should set the example to other districts of bearing our own burdens in the way proposed by the Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I suppose it will be made quite clear that the question of principle in regard to the Bill will not be raised before the Select Committee. I should also like to know whether the Board of Works will be entitled to appear by counsel before the Committee as well as the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Board (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg), who, I presume, would be represented by counsel as the promoter of the Bill. With regard to the Bill itself, I think it is a fair and legitimate compromise; and if the Metropolitan Members look into it they will see that they will do well to accept it in its entirety instead of raising points, because they must remember that points may also be raised on the other side. It has been suggested that the Committee should have power to strike out any of the Parks included in the Schedule. If that was the case, power should also be given to insert Parks. I presume this would be done.

CAPTAIN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I wish to point to one defect in this Bill, and I should like to have some assurance that the matter will be dealt with by the Committee. The case to which I allude is that of Victoria Park, in the East of London. Victoria Park was created a Royal Park, and made over to the Crown in 1841. I will read a few words from the Act of that year relating to the subject, because they are important as showing that this was intended to be a Royal Park for ever—

“And such lands and hereditaments, when purchased, to be conveyed and assured to Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, and when so conveyed, shall if ever thereafter be taken to be a Royal Park, by the name of ‘Victoria Park,’ and part and parcel of the possessions and land revenues of Her Majesty in right of the Crown; and all laws, provisions, and regulations now in force or hereafter to be in force with respect to Royal Parks, shall be taken to extend and apply to such Park, except that Her Majesty’s Commissioners of Woods, Forests, Land Revenues, Works, and Buildings of the time being, may in such manner as by law is provided with regard to the hereditary revenues of the Crown (not being Royal Parks, lease any part of the said Royal Park, &c.”

That raises a very material point. I cannot myself perceive on what ground a Royal Park in the industrial portion of London is to be transferred to the rates, and I should like some assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) that this is a subject which requires some investigation at the hands of the Committee, and that the Committee will have powers to deal with the point. I should not raise the question, but there is a very strong, and I think, justifiably strong feeling, that it is wrong to throw upon the ratepayers the cost of maintaining this Royal Park in a crowded part of London, while three Royal Parks in other and wealthier parts of London are chargeable on the Imperial Exchequer.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): I hope that we shall have an answer to the question which has been asked by my hon. and gallant Friend. There seems to be no difficulty with regard to the second reading. What we want to know is the scope of the reference to the Select Committee. The right hon. Gentleman opposite appears to acquiesce in the proposal of the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg); but if I construe this Reference correctly, it means that all Petitions are to be heard against the Bill, but none in its favour. If they may be heard against the Bill, I suppose they may be heard against any part of it or against the principle. Does the Government accept the Amendment on the Paper?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): The right hon. Gentleman must know that when a Bill is referred to a Select Committee of this kind it is referred without restriction. The Select Committee will, no doubt, have the power, if it chooses to exercise it, to recommend the House to pass the Bill, or reject it, or to alter or amend it. But, of course, the whole matter will be in the discretion of the House. Four Members of the Select Committee will be nominated by the House and three by the Committee of Selection. There are thus to be seven Members in all. The House, therefore, in the first place, has a control over the appointment of the Committee, and can take care that it fairly represents the general opinion of the House. The opinion of the Government is that as the House has accepted the second reading it has approved of the principle of the Bill; but I may further remind the House that if the Committee were to take the course which has been suggested, and which would be most unusual, the House would have full power to deal with the Bill when it came back from the Committee. The House is not going to part with any of its powers. It has affirmed a principle, and the Government intend to stand by the principle. I hope, therefore, the Motion for the second reading will be agreed to. My hon. and gallant Friend spoke about Victoria Park being a Royal Park. Well, it is not a Royal Park in the sense in which the other Parks which are known by that title are Royal Parks. The other Royal Parks are parks that at certain times were exchanged for Royal property. Victoria Park is not in that position, and, therefore, I do not think that my hon. and gallant Friend will consider that it is at all in the same category as the other Royal Parks.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I should only like to say one word on behalf of the Metropolitan Members on this side of the House. We most readily assent to the second reading, subject to the conditions of reference agreed to by the Government. As to the statement made by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), that in a sense the ratepayers of London are receiving a present of the capital expended on these Parks, that is only true to a very limited extent, and on the understanding that we had actually no voice in the spending of the money. We did not have even the slight and indirect control which we are able to exercise over the Metropolitan Board of Works.

MR. ISAACS (Newington, Walworth): Will the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) kindly say whether the Committee will have power to enlarge the number of properties mentioned in the Bill, or to omit any from the list?

MR. JACKSON: As I understand the matter, the Committee will have no power to introduce into the Bill any other properties than those now mentioned in it, except on a special Instruction given by the House.

VOL. CCCXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. KIMBER: Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask for your direction as to whether, assuming that the ratepayers of Wandsworth wish to place their case before the Committee on the Bill, their locus standi could be objected to? I understand the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to intimate that he does not know, and I should like to hear from the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Courtney) whether a Petition from them to the Select Committee would hold good? I only wish my constituents to be heard. I assent to the principle of the Bill, which, I admit, is reasonable; but I say that we in Wandsworth have an equitable claim.

MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the hon. Member's question, I can only say that the Committee will, of course, decide its own locus standi.

MR. KIMBER: Then do I understand that to make it clear I ought to move a special Instruction to the Committee?

MR. SPEAKER: It would be most unusual to fetter the Committee with an Instruction in the sense which the hon. Member refers to. It would be utterly without example.

MR. KIMBER: I am afraid I have not made myself understood. I wish in no case to object to the Preamble of the Bill. I only desire to get a hearing. I do not wish to fetter the Committee.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I would advise the hon. Member not to persevere with his intention. This is a Bill to settle relations between the Government and the Metropolis. The question the hon. Gentleman wishes to raise is really foreign to this Bill altogether.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee of Seven Members, Four to be nominated by the House and Three by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That all Petitions against the Bill, presented two clear days before the meeting of the Committee, be referred to the Committee that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.

FIRST OFFENDERS (re-committed)

BILL.—[BILL 189.]

(Mr. Howard Vincent, Lord Randolph Spencer Churchill, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Boars, Mr. Addison, Mr. Hastings, Mr. Lawson, Mr. Molloy.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 10th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Power to court to release upon probation of good conduct instead of sentencing to imprisonment) agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central), the following Clauses were inserted after Clause 1 :—

(Provision in case of offender failing to observe conditions of his recognizances.)

"(1.) If a court, having power to deal with the offender in respect of his original offence, or any court of summary jurisdiction is satisfied by information on oath that the offender has failed to observe any of the conditions of his recognizance, it may issue a warrant for his apprehension.

"(2.) An offender, when apprehended on any such warrant, shall, if not brought forthwith before the court having power to sentence him, be brought before a court of summary jurisdiction, and that court may either remand him by warrant until the time at which he was required by his recognizance to appear for judgment, or until the sitting of a court having power to deal with his original offence, or may admit him to bail with a sufficient surety conditioned on his appearing for judgment.

"(3.) The offender when so remanded may be committed to a prison, either for the county or place in or for which the court remanding him acts or for the county or place where he is bound to appear for judgment, and the warrant of remand shall order the gaoler to bring him before the court before which he was bound to appear for judgment, or to answer as to his conduct since his release.

(Conditions as to abode of the offender.)

"The court, before directing the release of an offender under this Act, shall be satisfied that the offender or his surety has a fixed place of abode or regular occupation in the county or place for which the court acts, or in which the offender is likely to live during the period named for the observance of the conditions."

(Power to vary conditions.)

"The court having power to sentence an offender released under this Act may, on his application at any time during the period of probation, vary the conditions of his release by substituting another authority for the authority first named or otherwise, as the case may require."

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I beg to move the following new clause :—

(Act not to apply to Ireland.)

"This Act shall not apply to Ireland."

New Clause brought up (Mr. Chance), and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I shall not oppose the hon. Member's proposal, although I regret it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. CHANCE: I beg to propose the adoption of the new clause of which Notice has been given by my hon. Friend the Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), as follows :—

(Duration of Act.)

"This Act shall remain in force until the thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight, and no longer."

We look upon this Bill as a very curious innovation. Its principle is not very clear, and I am afraid that some of its provisions will be found to be distinctly dangerous. But, of course, as it has been decided that the measure shall not apply to Ireland, I will not press this clause if it is the general sense of the Committee that it ought to be a permanent Act, although I myself do not think that it ought to be permanent.

New Clause—

(Duration of Act.)

"This Act shall remain in force until the thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight, and no longer,"—(Mr. Chance.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I hope the hon. Member will not press this Amendment. To limit the duration of the Bill in this manner would be altogether to divest the measure of its utility. The Bill has been very carefully considered. It was before the last Parliament; it has been under the consideration of the Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews); and it has been drafted by the Government draftsman. I trust the hon. Member will withdraw his proposal.

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): As one of those whose names appear on the back of the Bill, I also hope that the proposed new clause will not be added to the Bill.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I hope that this Amendment will not be agreed to. I am not myself aware of any Bill which has only had an operation of one year. To insert the clause would be to create an entirely new precedent. This is a Bill which can only be tested by experience and practice, and it is quite impossible to test anything thoroughly by experience and practice in the course of 12 months.

MR. CHANCE: As the opinion of the English Members seems to be against the Amendment I will not press it. It seems to me, however, that it will be a curious matter if any first offender is subjected to a longer period of probation than one year. At the same time, after the intimation that has been given to me of the feeling of the Committee I must ask leave to withdraw the clause.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported: as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACTS

(IRELAND) AMENDMENT (No. 2)

BILL.—[BILL 176.]

(Sir James Corry, Mr. Ewart, Mr. Johnston.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 19th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title).

Amendment proposed, in page 1, lines 5 and 6, leave out "Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Act Amendment," and insert "Municipal Corporation of Belfast."—(Sir James Corry.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): After what happened to-day it would be of no use to oppose the Amendment. After the declaration made on behalf of the Government, there is no choice between having a Bill confined to Belfast or no Bill at all. That being so, I do not think I am entitled, as a Belfast Member, to do anything to prejudice this reform. I shall, therefore, not oppose the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Words inserted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Commencement).

MR. SEXTON: I beg to move that Clause 2 be omitted. I am greatly astonished that the hon. Baronet (Sir James Corry) who is in charge of the Bill has not moved the Amendment himself. The clause provides that the Bill shall commence to take effect on the 31st of December, 1887. Now, after the passing of the last Amendment the Bill has become special, and the Bill is urgent. The Bill is special because it now applies to Belfast alone. The Corporation of Belfast is a Corporation which is composed of one class with one creed. The Bill is urgent because another measure will soon pass into law which will place on the town a very heavy burden. Supposing this Bill passes into law this Session, and this clause remains unaltered, the new franchise will not come into play until next year. It will not be until November, 1888, that the ratepayers under the new franchise will be entitled to elect one-third of the Council. They will not be able to elect a second third until 1889, and it will not be until 1890 that the whole of the present Members may have been displaced. I appeal, then, to the Committee not to give with one hand and to take away with the other. In an ordinary measure it is provided that the Act shall come into force as soon as it passes into law. I think the Committee will see that this clause ought to come out, and that the Bill ought to come into force in the present year.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 2.—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

SIR JAMES CORRY (Armagh, Mid): The object of this clause was to give time for the registration, which will be very heavy, and to bring the Bill into operation next year. I have, however, no objection whatever to the measure coming into operation as soon as it is passed.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause struck out.

Clause 3 (Amendment of Section 30 of the Municipal Corporations Act).

On the Motion of Sir JAMES CORRY, Amendments made, in page 1, line 13, by leaving out "as required," and inserting: "(hereinafter called the principal Act)" as requires;" page 1, lines 16 and 17, by leaving out "several boroughs named in Schedule A to said Act annexed," and inserting "municipal borough of Belfast."

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name—In page 1, line 20, to leave out "last day of August," and insert "twentieth day of July." The qualifying date in respect of the municipal franchise will, under this Bill, be the last day of August. The qualifying date in respect of the Parliamentary franchise is the 20th of July. I suppose that under this Bill there will be about 25,000 voters; and I have received many letters from Belfast respecting the trouble and expense which will be entailed by having two registrations of voters. Unless my Amendment is agreed to, there will have to be two attendances before the Revising Barrister—once in respect of the Parliamentary, and once in respect of the municipal franchise. I am acting in obedience to representations which have been made to me; and I say that for the two qualifications only one attendance ought to be necessary.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 20, to leave out "last day of August," and insert "twentieth day of July."—(Mr. Sexton.)

SIR JAMES CORRY (Armagh, Mid): This is an Amendment which I really cannot accept. The Bill was drawn on the same lines as the English Corporations Act; and the 31st of August is the date there given. It would be most inconvenient that the revision should take place on the day mentioned by the hon. Member, because the Parliamentary franchise and the municipal franchise do not correspond at all. It would be perfectly impossible for the two revisions to go on at the same time. We have a new element introduced into the municipal franchise by this Bill, because it allows women to vote. On the other hand, there is no lodger franchise, and no service franchise, in regard to the municipal elections. It would, therefore, be most inconvenient for the two registrations to go on at the same time. I, therefore, cannot accept the Amendment.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): May I point out to my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) that he has hardly put forward the full strength of his case, because the hon. Baronet who is in charge of the Bill has introduced into the section a technical expression, which is only to be found in Parliamentary Franchise Acts. The effect of adopting the 20th of July as the date at which the revision should take place would be that the authorities who make up the list of municipal voters would have all the advantage of being able to utilize the list already made up for the Parliamentary franchise. It would reduce their work 60 per cent, and no practical disadvantage would result. On the other hand, the very greatest expense and trouble will be caused by adopting a provision which is absolutely unknown in any franchise. The matter is merely one of utility and advantage.

MR. SEXTON: The remarks made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh (Sir James Corry) were entirely irrelevant. He says that some of the voters under the municipal franchise will be women. I really do not see what difference that makes. The qualifications of Parliamentary and municipal voters will be practically identical in Belfast, and one inspection will do for both. The two Courts would sit at the same time, and one Inspector will be able to attend both. I may say that my proposal is much more to the advantage of the hon. Baronet's friends than it is to our advantage, because we shall always be a small minority in Belfast. As far as I see at present I must press the Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 76; Noes 81: Majority 5. — (Div. List, No. 167.)

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Provisions of Act not to affect existing burgess roll) agreed to.

Clause 5 (Repeal of provisions of Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Act as to election of aldermen).

MR. SEXTON: I beg to move the omission of this clause. The hon. Baronet will confess that, while this might be permissible to a general Bill, it has no place in a Bill applicable solely to the borough of Belfast. This clause proposes to remove the election of aldermen from the burgesses and hand it over to the Council, and this is the only borough which is selected for the change. I am aware that it is the law in England; but we do not like it, and do not want it. The effect of its operation would be to elect aldermen all of the same class, as it gives the election of 10 aldermen every year into the hands of the 30 Councillors. I hope the hon. Baronet will consent to withdraw the clause.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 5.—(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I hope the hon. Baronet will not press this clause. It seems to me that it is a disfranchising, not an enfranchising clause. In Dublin and other boroughs the burgesses elect the aldermen, and I do not see why we should depart from the ordinary rule.

SIR JAMES CORRY: I have taken the clause, precisely as it stands, from the English Act, as I think, in a matter of this kind, we should assimilate the law of the two countries. I must insist upon the clause being retained.

MR. CHANCE: I trust the clause will not be retained, for it is introducing an absolutely new principle into the municipal franchise in Ireland. By the Bill you are proposing to give an extension of the municipal franchise, but by this clause you are taking it away; so that you are giving an extension of the franchise with the one hand and taking it away with the other. There is no reason whatever why this Bill should be used as a vehicle to import a new disfranchisement. I know that the English law has it; but it is a distinct disadvantage as compared with the Irish law. Originally this Bill was intended to apply to the whole of Ireland, and if we import into this the English law it will result in this—that when afterwards the Act is extended to the whole of Ireland this will be quoted as a precedent why we should apply it to the whole of Ireland. This is no Party matter. We desire to give to the Orange people of Belfast the government of their own town as far as municipal franchise is concerned, and we will be no party to imposing upon these people a new and special disability never yet known to the law of Ireland.

MR. EWART (Belfast, N.): As a Bill dealing with the local government of Ireland will be introduced next year, I think it would be a pity to impose, in the meantime, a charge of this sort upon one borough.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I only wish to make one remark upon this and the three following clauses. I have, in connection with a Committee upstairs, recently studied the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, and can trace but small relationship with the sections of that Act and these clauses proposed to be introduced into this Bill. I think these are not clauses fit to be introduced into an Act of Parliament. They are skeleton clauses, and on that ground alone, if on no other, I should object to them.

SIR JAMES CORRY: I could not accept the Motion without consulting my friends; and I beg to move, Sir, that you do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir James Corry.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I was not in the House, unfortunately, when this Bill went into Committee, otherwise I should have objected; but I now give the hon. Baronet warning that, having this lucky chance of getting his Bill, if he reports Progress to-night this is the last opportunity he will get.

MR. CHANCE: I hope the Committee will not allow the Motion to succeed. A large number of Members have stayed here at great inconvenience to do justice even to a small portion of Ireland, and I trust their efforts will not be frustrated.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I hope the hon. Member for Mid Armagh will not press the Motion. Undoubtedly the clause ought not to be introduced into a Bill of this kind.

SIR JAMES CORRY: I beg leave to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause struck out.

Clauses 6, 7, and 8 struck out.

New Clause (Application of Act), "The Act shall apply only to the borough of Belfast,"—(Sir James Corry,) —brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. T. M. HEALY: In consequence of what occurred this afternoon I am obliged to take a Division against this clause, restricting the application of the Act to the borough of Belfast.

MR. SEXTON: I am compelled to oppose the adoption of this new clause.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 114 ;
Noes 20: Majority 94. — (Div. List,
No. 168.)

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to move the insertion of a new clause, which is really consequential upon Clause 2. By Clause 2 the Bill will come into active operation immediately; and, therefore, the new franchise could be applied to the Register for the present year, instead of being delayed until the 8th of December, after the elections have been closed. The proposal I lay before the Committee is this. Having increased the number of burgesses from 5,000 to 25,000, you have no right to say that the 20,000 shall be left without the exercise of the voting power until November of next year; you have a right to admit them immediately to the exercise of this power, and more especially as there is a necessity of entering into contracts with respect to the main drainage scheme. Unless this clause is adopted the present Corporation, elected by a small body of persons, will, in the meantime, have entered into the contracts. I quote the Dublin Bill of 1849 as a precedent for the course I have taken. In the year 1849 the municipal franchise was extended to Dublin, and the House of Commons of that day, taking a common-sense view of the matter, allowed the ratepayers the exercise of the powers immediately the Bill was passed, whereby there was a full election. I ask that that precedent shall be now followed.

New Clause—

(First Election of New Council.)

"At the date of the ordinary annual municipal elections for the borough of Belfast, occurring next after the passing of this Act, every seat in the Municipal Council of Belfast shall become vacant, as if the period of occupancy prescribed by Law had expired, and there shall be on the said date a new election for any seat in the said Council,"—(Mr. Sexton,) —brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Clause be read a second time."

SIR JAMES CORRY: I must oppose the introduction of this clause into the Bill, as its adoption, in my opinion, would be likely to be very serious indeed. I think it would be much better that a number of the members of the old Corporation should remain for some time as members, certainly until the drainage scheme is properly carried out. I think it would be most unfortunate were this clause to be adopted, and I must strongly oppose it.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): I think the remarks of the hon. Baronet are the strongest condemnation of the contention of the opponents of the proposal—namely, that if the electors had this power they would not have confidence in the old Corporation. Well, Sir, if it be that the Belfast Corporation is about to proceed to an enormous contract, saddling the town of Belfast with £500,000, I am quite sure the proposal of the hon. Member for West Belfast is the one the Committee would follow. It would be contrary to all precedent that there should be any unnecessary delay in allowing the electorate to come into the exercise of their new powers at once.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): It appears to me not to accept this proposal would place the Corporation of Belfast in a very awkward position. Two-thirds of the Corporation would thus represent about 6,000 ratepayers, and the remaining one-third would represent a very largely increased constituency of, say, 40,000 ratepayers, as women householders under this Bill have votes. By the hon. Baronet's contention the two-thirds, representing 6,000 people, would have double the voting power and control of those who represented an electorate of 40,000 voters or upwards. I think that would be entirely unprecedented. I certainly hope the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Armagh will see his way to accept this clause. It seems to me that it would only be just and fair that the new electorate that is constituted should be brought into play at once, so that the new Corporation may represent the opinion of the entire town.

MR. EWART: I am very strongly opposed indeed to this clause, as I think to have an election next November for an entire new Town Council would lead to a deal of disturbance and confusion, and that in the present state of Belfast it would be highly undesirable. If this clause is adopted I think very many of the old Corporation would seize the opportunity of retiring from the duties, and I think the Council would be very much injured in consequence. It appears to me a very unwise thing to do. Politically speaking, it would not make any difference; but it would create a great deal of inconvenience locally.

MR. CHANCE: It will be in the recollection of the Committee that upon two occasions or more the proceedings in Committee upon the Belfast Main Drainage Bill have been postponed expressly on account that no money should be spent upon that scheme until the people of Belfast had an effective control over their local affairs. After these decisions, the Committee of the House would stultify itself if it decided that while the Main Drainage Bill is passed, and a large amount of money spent at once, the people of Belfast shall have no control over their affairs for two years. Either this clause must be inserted, or all action under the Drainage Bill must be suspended for two years, for we have positively decided that not a penny shall be spent until the representatives of the extended franchise have control.

MR. F. S. POWELL: There is one question I should like to ask the hon. Member for West Belfast. What is the effect of this clause? Is it intended to have an entirely new Council at the expiration of the annual term, and is it intended that part of the new Council shall go out after a short interval, another after a longer term, and the third after a still longer interval, or, again, that all the members always go out at the time?

MR. CHANCE: The original Municipal Act is adhered to with the new franchise. The machinery of the old Act will be applied; the retirement of the Council will be as before—simply the extension of the franchise will apply at once.

Motion agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. CHANCE: As a consequence of the adoption of this Amendment, we have to provide for a person to preside at these elections. The old Act provides that an alderman or councillor shall preside; but, every seat being declared vacant, there would be no person qualified to preside. I will therefore move that the person who, under the present law, would fill the post, shall do so under the altered circumstances.

Amendment proposed,

To add to the new Clause—"Provided always that the person who by law would be bound to preside at the next election if this Act were not passed shall nevertheless preside at such election."—(Mr. Chance.)

Amendment agreed to.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next clause standing in the name of the hon. Member for West Belfast—in reference to the suspension of the main drainage scheme—cannot, as I have already mentioned, be moved in Committee.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to say that I shall move it on the consideration of Report.

Bill reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be taken into Consideration, as amended, on Monday 6th June."—(Sir James Corry.)

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the hon. Baronet to fix that stage for Monday next. The Main Drainage Bill, as he is aware, is hung up until June 20, to allow this Bill to pass; and with the Whitsuntide holidays intervening, there is not much time to allow of the Bill being sent up to "another place." I must move that the Report be taken on Monday next.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "6th June," and add the word "next."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the words '6th June' stand part of the Question."

SIR JAMES CORRY: June 6 will be more convenient. I have made arrangements that will not allow me to be in my place on Monday.

MR. CHANCE: We will move it then.

MR. SEXTON: I must move for Monday next; the question is urgent.

SIR JAMES CORRY: I think I can undertake to say the Bill will not be delayed in the House of Lords.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the word 'next' be there added," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Bill, as amended, to be taken into Consideration upon Monday next.

DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT REGISTRATION BILL.—[BILL 231.]

(Sir Albert Rollit, Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Howard Vincent, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Coddington, Mr. Lawson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 13th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Extent of Act).

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): So far as I can judge this is an admirable Bill; but I cannot see why its promoters should wish to restrict its application to England. I see no reason whatever why it should not apply to Ireland, and, therefore, I beg to move the omission of the words "or Ireland."

Amendment proposed, line 11, to leave out the words "or Ireland."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I welcome that Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Commencement of Act) agreed to.

Clause 4 struck out.

Clause 5 (Avoidance of unregistered deeds of arrangement).

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): In line 21 I move the second of my Amendments, to omit the word "immediately."

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has no Amendment on the Paper.

MR. CHANCE: But I move it, Sir. It is an Amendment I understand the promoters agree to, substituting the "words within a week after the execution thereof" for the word "immediately."

Amendment proposed, to omit the word "immediately," and insert the words "within one week."—(Mr. Chance.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Mode of registration).

On the Motion of The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir Edward Clarke), Amendment made, in page 2, line 29, after "affidavit," by leaving out "of" and inserting "verifying."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Form of register) agreed to.

Clause 8 (The registrar, and the office for registration).

On the Motion of The SOLICITOR GENERAL, Amendment made, in page 3, line 6, by leaving out "attached to the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice."

On the Motion of Mr. CHANCE, Amendment made, in line 7, after "shall" by inserting "and the Registrar of Bills of Sale in Ireland shall."

Amendment proposed,

In line 11, after the words "in England shall," insert "and the Bill of Sale officer in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland shall."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CLARKE) (Plymouth): Before this Amendment is adopted and further progress made, I should like to have it clearly stated whether these Amendments have been agreed to by the Attorneys General for England and Ireland. So far as I am aware, no such agreement has been come to. I am not in a position to say how far these Amendments are consequential upon the extension of the Bill to Ireland; but if they have been agreed upon I make no further objection. But, at the same time, I think that opportunity should be given that their full effect may be considered.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT: The principle of applying the Bill to Ireland was distinctly agreed upon; but upon these Amendments, which we feel were consequential upon the general agreement—these particular words—I cannot say there was an agreement. But ample time will be allowed for their consideration before Report.

MR. CHANCE: They are consequential Amendments, and can be dealt with on Report. I trust there may be no factious opposition at this stage.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE: It is a serious matter to go on inserting Amendments which have not been considered and agreed upon by anyone responsible on this Bench for the conduct of such Business as this. We have introduced Amendments to this section—for instance, the authority is mentioned for registering in Ireland; it may be the proper authority, but I am not in a position to discuss the question now, nor, so far as I know, is any Member of the Government present in a position to make himself acquainted with the effect of the alterations suggested by the hon. Member for South Islington (Sir Albert Rollit). We have got to a stage, I think, when we might report Progress, and it would be very much better to put these Amendments on the Paper, that they may be considered before we go on further with the clauses.

MR. CHANCE: Of course, I am in the hands of the Committee; but these are purely consequential Amendments, and reasonable objection cannot be taken to them. But, if necessary, I am willing to reserve my Amendments for Report. I did not think there would be the slightest objection, and I consulted with the hon. Member who brought in the Bill, and who knows the subject thoroughly. I do not wish to prevent Progress being made with the Bill, and if I am pressed—unreasonably pressed—I must yield, and insert the Amendments on Report.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT: I hope there will be no unreasonable objection to our going on. I have satisfied myself of the propriety of the Amendments as consequent upon the extension of the Bill to Ireland; and I have no doubt they will be approved by the Attorney General, who has given me material assistance in shaping the measure. I hope the Solicitor General will see his way to allowing us to proceed.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON) (Leeds, N.): I do not think there is any desire on the part of anybody to raise factious opposition to the Bill; but I am sure the hon. Member will agree that, inasmuch as the matter is one particularly for the consideration of the Attorney General, who has not seen the Amendments, and that we have no knowledge—certainly I have no knowledge—of the effect of the alterations, and that the ultimate progress of the Bill will not be retarded, it will be better to report Progress now, and the Attorney General will have an opportunity of seeing the Amendments before they are inserted.

MR. CHANCE: I presume, if Amendments of any considerable nature were made on Report, the third reading could not be taken on the same evening, and, therefore, there can be no object in finishing the Committee to-night. At the same time, I would say that, having settled that Ireland is to be included, we should stultify ourselves and make absolute nonsense of the section if we introduced provisions that could not apply to Ireland. I agree to reporting Progress now it will not make any real difference.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

EGYPT—THE RUMOURED ANGLO-TURKISH CONVENTION.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he wished to ask the Prime Minister a Question of which he had given private Notice—namely, Whether he can give the House any information respecting the Convention as to Egypt, said to have been signed between England and the Porte?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I am afraid I am not able to give as much information as I could wish. Late last night, certainly, an agreement was come to which disposed of a good deal of the difference between the Porte and ourselves. How far the agreement went I am unable to say, as the telegrams are somewhat confusing; and I am afraid that if I went into details I might possibly give an inaccurate impression. The negotiations, however, are going on very favourably, and I hope that when Parliament meets after the holidays I shall be able to lay further information before your Lordships.

HYDE PARK CORNER (NEW STREETS) BILL.—(No. 79.)

(The Lord Henniker.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Lord HENNIKER, who had given Notice to move to disagree to the Amendments proposed by the Select Committee on the Bill, said, it was always a rather strong measure to attack the decision of a Committee of the House, particularly such a Committee as sat on this Bill. The Office of Works felt very strongly that it was most important to pass this Bill this Session, and he wished it to be distinctly understood that he in no way wished to say anything against the decision of the Committee, who, no doubt, had decided as they thought right from the evidence placed before them. He, however, made an appeal to the House and to the Members of the Select Committee to allow the Bill to pass on the ground of expediency. The Bill was introduced in 1883, 1884, and 1885. He merely mentioned this to show how long the question had been pending, how much difficulty there had been in dealing with it, and that it seemed to be quite time that some conclusion should be come to on what was, after all, a small matter. It was only necessary for him to say what had happened last Session and this Session. In 1886 the Bill was introduced into the House of Commons, but was altered in Committee, so that the cost of maintaining the roads was thrown on the parish of St. George's, Hanover Square, and the Metropolitan Board of Works in equal parts. When the Bill came to the House of Lords the Committee of this House rejected this proposal. The Bill was accordingly lost. This Session it was again introduced into the House of Commons in exactly the same form in which it left it last Session, and the Committee to which it was referred reversed the decision of last year, and made St. George's, Hanover Square, pay two-thirds of the cost and St. Martin-in-the-Fields one-third. When it came to the House of Lords they reversed last year's decision and altered the Bill, so that St. George's was to pay three-sixths, St. Martin's one-sixth, and the Metropolitan Board of Works two-sixths of the expense. Their Lordships would see that the decisions in each House of last year were exactly reversed this Session. This again showed the great difficulty there had been in coming to a conclusion, and the almost impossibility of coming to a more satisfactory settlement. St. George's had always been ready to pay half the cost; it was much more an improvement for the advantage of that parish than it could possibly be to St. Martin's, and the extra cost thrown on St. George's was so small that he hoped that parish would be ready to pay what was asked of them, rather than allow the question to be hung up indefinitely. Taking a disinterested view of the question, it did not seem fair that a new precedent should be created for the Metropolitan Board of Works, or that parishes like Poplar and others in the Metropolitan area should be asked to maintain an improvement which was of no benefit to them. There was no parallel precedent that he knew of in the history of the Board of Works, except that of the Thames Embankment, where the Board kept the roadway up; but this was a very exceptional case. It was true that the Board paid some part of the cost of the maintenance of Westminster Bridge; but this was not a fair precedent, as the circumstances were different. Their Lordships would have noticed that the Metropolitan Members had met and decided to oppose the Amendments made in their Lordships' House. He supposed the Committee there would not go back from their decision under the circumstances. He, therefore, made a strong appeal to the House to let the Bill go back to the House of Commons as it came from there, and to the Members of the Committee not to press their views, so that the Bill might pass in the form which appeared to be the most acceptable solution of the question which at present had been proposed. His Lordship concluded by moving the rejection of the Amendments proposed.

Moved, "To disagree to the Amendments proposed by the Select Committee on the Bill."—(The Lord Henniker.)

THE EARL OF JERSEY said, that as Chairman of and as representing the Select Committee, they had not to consider the question of expediency, but to endeavour to come to a decision on fair and equitable grounds. He did not wish to disregard the appeal made by the Government on the ground of expediency; and on that ground alone, in order that the Bill might be passed this Session and become law, the Committee did not propose to ask their Lordships to insist upon their Amendments.

Motion agreed to; Amendments negatived; Bill reported without Amendment, and to be read 3^d on Thursday the 9th of June next.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE BILL.—(No. 54.)

(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee upon the said Bill."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD BRABOURNE said, he must ask the permission of their Lordships to make a few remarks on the general scope and character of the Bill. He must confess that he was rather disappointed on the occasion of the second reading. He came down to the House fully prepared and expecting to hear an exhaustive debate on the principle involved in the Bill, which, he thought, the importance of the subject deserved. The House was well filled, and several Members of the Episcopal Bench were present; but, to his surprise, the Prime Minister moved the second reading of the Bill without a word of comment, the Question was promptly put from the Chair, and that stage of the Bill was passed with a celerity which, he humbly submitted, was hardly respectful to the great interests which were involved. It was under these circumstances that he humbly craved the indulgence of their Lordships, and he did so for a special reason. It appeared to him that this Bill touched the fringe of a great question, and touched it in such a manner as would infallibly cause it to be brought prominently before the public in a manner not contemplated by the framers of the Bill. In his introductory speech the Prime Minister told their Lordships that the Bill related to a subject which had recently attracted considerable attention—namely, the incidence and the mode of collection of tithe. But why had this question attracted considerable interest? Because the unusual and long-continued depression which had fallen on the agricultural community had caused tithe rent-charges to be collected with less facility than heretofore, and because, also, whereas the tithe rent-charge at the time of its commutation was calculated on the price of certain agricultural produce, the price of that produce had fallen considerably in value. If, in these circumstances, the noble Marquess had thought it right to bring in a Bill for the re-valuation of tithe, or if he had thought it well to cause any alteration to be made in the basis on which they were collected, or, if objecting to such an alteration, he had proposed a Select Committee to inquire into all the circumstances of the case, possibly the public mind might have been for the moment satisfied. But the noble Marquess had taken a very different course. He had declared that tithe was not excessive; that at the time of the commutation the landowners made a good bargain; and he met the distress of the agriculturists and the complaints of the tithepayers by the singular device of increasing the security of the titheowners. Such a mode of proceeding would hardly be found satisfying; and he believed it would be found that, in proposing what the noble Marquess had done, he had made an innovation which would at once be noted by his opponents. For the first time in the history of this country the noble Marquess practically divorced the tithe from the land, made it a personal debt recoverable from an individual, and thus, he feared, inserted the thin end of the wedge, upon which the hammers of the friends of Disestablishment would hereafter be busily employed. The novelty of the principle thus introduced by the noble Marquess—the whole tenour of his Bill, and, indeed, the very basis upon which it rested—obliged him (Lord Brabourne) to say a few words upon the general question of tithe as it bore upon this particular measure. It was necessary to do so, both on account of something which had happened in the past, and of something which would certainly happen in the future. That which had happened in the past was this—that the advocates of Disestablishment and the defenders of the Church had put forward statements concerning tithe so contradictory as to confuse and mystify the public mind on the subject. That which would happen in the future was this—that when this Bill went down to the other House it would be carefully scrutinized and discussed by men who held different views, and he submitted that it was hardly wise—nay, hardly creditable to their Lordships—that they should proceed to legislate as if there was only one side to the question. While he thought that the advocates of Disestablishment had put forth many statements difficult to substantiate, he was bound to say, on the other hand, that the defenders of the Church had not always assumed a position which was entirely impregnable. No doubt, many of their Lordships had read the defence of the Church which had emanated from the pen of the noble and learned Earl who had recently occupied the Woolsack (the Earl of Selborne). It would be presumptuous in him (Lord Brabourne) to speak of the ability and research displayed in that book, because nothing but research and ability would be expected from such a quarter. But, even in that volume, he could not help thinking that he detected something of the dogmatic tone which prevailed in the writings of ecclesiastical authorities. Statements were made concerning facts which had always been in dispute, as if those facts were beyond all doubt and controversy, whilst writers who had arrived at conclusions different from those of the noble and learned Earl were summarily dismissed as "uncritical writers," and their statements treated as "idle stories." There was a notable instance of this in regard to this very question of tithes. There was a very large party in this country who would not be excluded from this question, and who maintained that the clergy had not the exclusive right to the tithe, but that there was originally a division of the tithe for several purposes. They were in the habit of quoting the famous answer of Pope Gregory the Great to Augustine, in which he stated that the division of the offerings made by the faithful at the altar should be fourfold—first, a share to the Bishop and his family—propter hospitalitatem atque susceptionem; secondly, a share for the maintenance of the clergy; thirdly, the relief of the poor; and, fourthly, the fabric of the churches. Afterwards, when the Bishops were supported from other resources, their share was eliminated, and the division was threefold. Now, the noble and learned Earl admitted that this answer was given by Pope Gregory; he admitted that this division of tithes prevailed in parts of Western Christendom; but he denied that it ever existed in England. He (Lord Brabourne) would not presume to enter into an argument with the noble and learned Earl, neither would he trouble their Lordships with a dissertation upon the Law of Tithes; but he called their attention to these facts in order that they might be aware that the exclusive right of the clergy to tithe was still challenged, and that it would be unwise to discuss this question as if the contrary were the case. In his humble judgment, the true wisdom of the Church of England would be to rest her claim to tithe, not on the appeals of ecclesiastical writers to a history which was at least doubtful, but upon a law and a fact which were beyond doubt or dispute. The law to which he referred was the Commutation Act of 1836, which gave the Church a Parliamentary title to the tithe, though, of course, at the same time it assumed and asserted the right of Parliament to determine the manner in which, and the extent to which, tithes should be levied. And the fact to which he alluded, and which he believed gave to the Church still greater security, was a fact to be found in the exemplary lives of her clergy, their conscientious discharge of their duties, and the liberal and generous spirit in which their incomes were spent among their people. He (Lord Brabourne) believed that there never was, at any time or in any country, a class of men who bestowed a larger proportion of their incomes in charity and good works than did the clergy of the Church of England, and he should indeed regret it if any legislation of that House should diminish their influence, or lessen their powers of well-doing. It was, therefore, in no spirit of hostility to the Church that he (Lord Brabourne) proceeded to comment upon the Bill. His noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) had stated that, at the time of the commutation in 1836, the landowners had made, and still had, a good bargain. He ventured to say, on the one hand, that a good bargain had been made by the Church. It was easy enough to point to the value of tithes before the commutation, and to show by figures that the Church afterwards received a less amount. But figures were deceptive things, and there was something else to be taken into consideration. Did the noble Marquess remember what was the state of things before the Commutation Act? In introducing his Bill Lord John Russell said that "the objection to tithes was daily increasing in strength, and that men were becoming more and more unwilling to pay them." He stated, moreover, emphatically, in allusion to those who "were in the habit of talking of the absolute right to tithe," that, in his opinion, tithe was "the property of the nation, although participated in by individuals." Well, at the time of the Act in question voluntary commutation had taken place in about 2,000 parishes in England. Over the greater part of the country tithe was still taken in kind. And what did that mean? That in a very large number of cases the clergyman had either to secure the goodwill of his parishioners by a considerable sacrifice of income, or to run a grievous risk of forfeiting that goodwill by insisting upon his strict legal rights. People talked now as if tithe meant the tenth of the net produce—that was, the realized produce of the land. It was no such thing. It was the tenth of the gross produce to which the clergyman had a right—he could take the tenth sheaf of wheat, the tenth cock of hay, the tenth lamb, and so on, down to the tenth egg; and, if time permitted, he (Lord Brabourne) could tell their Lordships some laughable stories as to the deception which was sometimes practised in these matters. But then the clergyman had to convert the produce into money as he could. Many of their Lordships could doubtless remember the old barns and premises which used to stand in the vicinity of country rectories. What did those mean? They were the places in which the tithe produce was stored, and in which took place the process of conversion into money. They represented the trouble and expense to which the clergyman was put, plus the actual expense of collecting the tithe, and they represented something more—those barns and premises represented an item of repairs and dilapidations which greatly reduced the income of a clergyman, apart from the actual cost already named. All this the clergyman entirely got rid of by the Act of 1836, and he had since received his money without any of the enormous trouble and expense which before that Act he was obliged to encounter. But he gained something more. Besides the Parliamentary title to tithes acquired under that Act, the Church got quit of that friction which had previously existed between the clergy and their parishioners, and which was of very serious import. The Church had, indeed, made no bad bargain under the Act of 1836, even if there had been some sacrifice of actual income. That was the opinion at the time, and if noble Lords would take the trouble to refer to the debates, they would find that the Bill was constantly referred to as "the Clergyman's Bill," on account of the belief which was entertained that it was favourable to the interests of the clergy. In his (Lord Brabourne's) opinion, not only was the Act in question beneficial to the Church, but the friction between the clergy and their parishioners had become so great as to be almost unbearable; and if some such well-considered measure had not been passed at the time, he felt confident that serious mischief would have ensued, and that the position of the advocates of Disestablishment would have been far stronger to-day than was happily the case. The noble Marquess had stated that this was legitimately an owner's and not an occupier's tax. The same thing was clearly stated in the noble and learned Earl's (the Earl of Selborne's) pamphlet. He said—

"The rent of tithe-free land is always greater than that of land subject to tithe; if there were no tithe, the landowner, and not the occupier, would have the benefit."

Now, that was not exactly the form in which the matter presented itself to the agricultural mind in this time of distress. Take the case of a farmer who was paying 30*s.* an acre for his farm—20*s.* in rent and 10*s.* in tithe, and in many cases the tithe actually bore a higher proportion to the rent than that. Now, in many such cases the occupier had received a reduction from 20*s.* to 15*s.* in his rent, so that this 25 per cent reduction brought his total payment down to 25*s.* per acre. He could not expect to obtain a similar reduction from the titheowner. But he knew perfectly well that if there were no such thing as tithe, and that it had been 30*s.* per acre paid to one man, his reduction would, in all probability, have been from 30*s.*, not to 25*s.*, but to 20*s.*, because it was much easier to get a reduction from one man to whom the whole 30*s.* was payable than from two men who divided the receipts in the proportion of 20*s.* to one and 10*s.* to the other. That was the practical way in which the question presented itself to the occupier; or, put it in another way, if there were no tithe the landowner could better afford to let his land for 20*s.* per acre to the occupier than he could afford to let it at 15*s.* or 16*s.* with a payment upon it of 10*s.* per acre to the titheowner. No doubt the intention of the Act of 1836 was that the occupier should pay the tithe and deduct it from his rent. In practice, the landowner let his land at a lower rate than he otherwise would have done, and the tenant undertook to pay the tithe. It was thus practically made an occupier's debt, which could be recovered, just as rent, by distraint. But was this so wholly wrong? Tithe, in its origin, was not a charge upon the land, but upon the produce of the land; and it did not seem unwise or unjust that, upon whomsoever the burden should ultimately fall, it should, in the first instance, be discharged by and through the person who dealt directly with the produce—namely, the occupier. Moreover, it was much more convenient that it should be so, inasmuch as the occupier was almost always resident upon the land, whilst the landlord was constantly non-resident. Now, what good would this Bill effect in that respect? He (Lord Brabourne) did not understand that it was proposed to interfere with the contract which might be made between man and man. If such interference were contemplated, it would probably be evaded; but if not, what would probably be done? The landowner would still, for obvious reasons, desire to keep before his tenants' eyes what the land was paying for rent and for tithe separately. He would, therefore, say to his tenant—"We will keep the rent as it is, and as the Legislature has now directed that the tithe is to be paid through me and not through you, I will pay it, and we will have a covenant in our agreement that you shall pay me an equivalent for that tithe in our annual settlement of rent." The payments will thus be still kept separate—the occupier will know, as he now knows, what he is practically paying on account of tithe, and all that you will have effected by this Bill will be to have put an end to an arrangement which, upon the whole, has been proved by experience to be the most convenient for all parties concerned. But now he (Lord Brabourne) desired to call their Lordships' attention to two points of special importance—first, with regard to the owners; and, secondly, with regard to the remedy proposed by the Bill in lieu of distraint. Now, first, as to the owners, who were they? Their Lordships' House was frequently designated a House of Landowners; and therefrom some persons deduced the singular argument that they were unfit to legislate upon any question relating to land. But he earnestly wished to impress this upon their Lordships—that they were not now dealing with a matter which concerned only large landowners. This question had been greatly misunderstood. There was a very large number of small landowners in this country. The most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) was recently endeavouring to show that the reduction of 5 per cent to owners for prompt payment was unnecessary, and that there was practically very little expense and inconvenience to the clergy at present in the collection of tithes. To show that the most rev. Prelate took 10 parishes, taken haphazard from five different counties—two from each county—and said that in these parishes, out of 883 tithepayers, upwards of 700 were owners of the land, for which they paid tithes. And he went on to say that out of 58,000 persons who paid tithes to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, 37,000, or nearly two-thirds, were owners. Now, these words were pregnant with meaning and instruction. Let their Lordships examine a little more closely into this question of small owners. Take the case of any parish in which there were men occupying 10, 20, 50, or 100 acres, which he would call a small occupation. Now, if these men were the tenants of a large owner, the clergyman's tithe was practically secure. It was not from them that the difficulty arose. And why? Because the landowner and his agent knew perfectly well that if the tenant left at Michaelmas with his tithe unpaid, the titheowner could recover it from the land. Therefore, the land agent who knew his duty would take care that no tenant leaving a farm received his valuation from an incoming tenant until he could produce the receipt for his tithe, just as much as for his rent. So the clergyman had the landowner and his agent standing between himself and the occupier, and his tithe was secure.

But now take the case of men holding 10, 20, 50, or 100 acres of their own. These men were amongst the most suffering of the whole community. The legislation of the last 40 years, whether it was right or wrong, had been all in favour of the consumer, and had pressed most cruelly upon the British producer. Those small owners of land had felt the full pressure and weight of this legislation. They had been ground down to the ground. In an immense number of cases they had been obliged to mortgage their small properties up to the hilt, and they were crippled by the payment of interest which was higher than would have been their rent if they had been the tenants of a large landowner. Now, to these men, the payment of 5s., 6s., 8s., or 10s. per acre tithe was a grievous burden, and it was with them that the chief difficulty arose. What relief was offered them by this Bill? Not one fraction. Remember, moreover, that this class of small owners was one which many people thought it was most desirable to extend and encourage. But the only change which this Bill proposed to make in their condition was a change for the worse. He (Lord Brabourne), being no lawyer, spoke with diffidence upon legal points; but he apprehended that when tithe was made a simple debt, and a man was made personally liable, as proposed by the Bill, it meant that all his resources must be called upon to defray the debt, and that failing payment he must suffer in his person. So that what this Bill would do would be to make the small owner personally liable, and all his property, whatever it might be, liable, for a debt which, at present, attached only to that part of his property which happened to be in land. He (Lord Brabourne) could not help thinking that his noble Friend at the head of the Government had felt this to be a hardship, and had had this class of small owners in view when he proposed that 5 per cent reduction should be allowed for payment within 3 months. If he (Lord Brabourne) had introduced this Bill, he was not prepared to say that he should have proposed relief to the tithepayer in that form; but as the noble Marquess had done so, he could not but regret that he had withdrawn it at the very first blast of clerical opposition. There was something to be said on both sides. Where the clergyman had incurred small or no expense in collecting his tithes, on account of the paucity of owners from whom he had to collect, no doubt the effect would have been that he would have been giving 5 per cent to his tithepayers without equivalent advantage to himself. In other words, he would just now be giving a reduction of 5 per cent, where his lay brethren were giving 20 and 25 per cent reduction in their rents. But if he had been obliged to incur expense and trouble in collection, this would have been saved to him; and, moreover, there would have been the inducement to small and struggling owners to strain every nerve to pay quickly, and thus obtain their 5 per cent, instead of deferring payment until the last possible moment. Moreover, as there was going to be a new security given to the Church, this proposal of 5 per cent reduction did not seem wholly unreasonable, and would have been hailed as some earnest of sympathy with the distressed agriculturists on the part of the Legislature. He therefore regretted that, having been proposed, it had been so summarily withdrawn. And now he (Lord Brabourne) came to that which had been heralded forth as the great boon to be given by the Bill—namely, the abolition of distress for tithe. He confessed that he was rather a heretic in that matter. He very much doubted whether the abolition of the power of distraint was going to do all the good which was expected. He had no figures to show to their Lordships upon this subject; and, if he had, he doubted if he should trouble them with figures which were apt to mislead. But many of the cases of distraint in the counties of Kent and Sussex had been with respect to "Extraordinary Tithe," with which this Bill did not deal. It had been dealt with last year by a Bill which he, for one, had weakly accepted, because he found that the whole Bench of Bishops were unanimously in its favour, but which he believed to be one of the most unjust Bills ever placed upon the Statute Book. Extraordinary tithe essentially related to a specially remunerative kind of produce, of which the occupier got the benefit; and the Bill in question had placed a permanent charge upon the land after the remunerative crop had ceased to be grown, and when it had probably rendered the land less valuable for the future. But they were now dealing only with ordinary tithe, and he could not say how many cases of distraint had recently occurred. As he understood the present measure, it substituted for distraint the ordinary process of the County Courts. Now, he (Lord Brabourne) believed that recalcitrant tithepayers would be much less in fear of the County Court than they were at present of distraint. Distraint was a very disagreeable thing. It was very unpleasant to have bailiffs in possession of your premises, and to have your goods sold to defray your debts. But, because it was so disagreeable, people were the more anxious to avoid it, and the remedy, though short and sharp, was effective. A man would generally prefer to pay his tithe, rather than submit to this process. But proceedings in the County Court did not come home to him nearly so soon, whilst they put the person who instituted them to considerable trouble and annoyance. First, there was the summons to be taken out, and the debt proved. If that was done, an order was generally made for the payment of the debt by instalments. Perhaps these were paid at first, and then suspended. Then came another application to the Court, and, finally, a judgment summons was issued. Upon that a month was usually given before the expiration of which the debt was to be paid. During all that time the clergyman would be placed in the invidious position of prosecuting his parishioner, and if, at the end of the month, the debt was not paid, he did not recover his debt as he did by distraint, but the remedy was the committal of the non-paying tithepayer to prison for 14 days. He very much questioned the advantage to the Church of this change. It would enable people who objected to the payment of tithes to pose as martyrs, and would be not unlikely to give rise to an agitation of which the consequences could not be foreseen. He much feared that the change would be productive of very little advantage. And now there was only one more detail of the Bill with which he must trouble their Lordships. He alluded to the Redemption Clauses. He had seen with some surprise that these had been objected to by the clergy, for they appeared to him (Lord Brabourne) rather favourable than otherwise to the Church. Let him take a case.

The noble Marquess proposed that 20 times the value of the apportioned rent-charge should be the price of redemption—that was to say, that for £100 of rent-charge an owner would pay £2,000, or 20 years' purchase. But as, at present, the value of the £100 was about £87, the actual number of years' purchase would be 23 and not 20. But the value of the rent-charge was falling, and competent judges expected it would ere long be at £75, or even at £70, which would make the number of years' purchase considerably greater. A man who was about to redeem tithe rent-charge would have to take this falling value into account. Moreover, when the tithe was redeemed he would no longer have to point to this charge, when letting his land, as some criterion for the rent; and though this seemed to matter little, in reality it was of some moment, and a person hiring the land would not take into account the sum which an owner had paid to redeem tithe, though he would necessarily take into account the annual charge so long as it existed. But there was something more. One of the great complaints of the clergy was that their tithe rent-charge was rated up to its full value. Now, as soon as the clergymen had received and invested his redemption money it would no longer be rateable. But as the same amount of rates would still have to be raised, it followed that a larger amount would fall upon the land upon which the tithe rent-charge had been redeemed. Taking this into account, the proposal of the noble Marquess would not work out very advantageously to the landowner, and he would think once, twice, and three times before he redeemed upon the proposed terms. But now look at it from the other side. The clergyman would receive a capital sum of £2,000, instead of £87 per annum now paid. But this £87 was likely to fall to £75. If his investments were restricted, he might not be able to get more than 3½ per cent for his £2,000, which would be £70 instead of £75. But he would at once obtain immunity from rates which could not be calculated at less than 10 per cent on the average; so that, when the question came to be closely worked out, it would be found that the actual loss to the clergyman would be very small, if eventually anything at all. But would he gain nothing, independently of pecuniary considerations? There would be a far greater security for his new investment than there was for his rent-charge to-day. It was impossible to observe what was passing daily in this country without coming to that conclusion. No one could see the attitude taken by the advocates of Disestablishment without foreseeing future struggles. He (Lord Brabourne) did not wish to make Party allusions in this debate; but he could not help feeling that the events of the two or three last years had shown the probability that, at any moment, political exigencies might throw the whole weight of a powerful Party organization into the Disestablishment scale, and that we might have eminent men coming forward and pointing to particular sentences in their past speeches, which proved that for 12 or 14 years past they had not uttered a word against the principle of Disestablishment. Therefore it was that he (Lord Brabourne) felt sure that anything which drew the Church and her revenues outside the whirlpool of political agitation and political intrigue would be beneficial to the Church, even if it should involve some sacrifice of income, and therefore it was that he should rejoice if such terms of redemption could be offered as would make it a matter of easy and early accomplishment. And now he had only a few words to say besides thanking their Lordships for the indulgent hearing which they had given him. He could not help feeling that, in all these discussions, they were shirking the great difficulty which really underlay the question of tithes. There could be no doubt that, on the one hand, the burden pressed heavily upon the weaker part of the agricultural community in its present depressed condition, whilst, on the other hand, the incomes of the parochial clergy were really insufficient for the calls made upon them. What, then, was the real truth which lurked behind the question? It was this—that if a National Church was to exist among us as an Establishment, it ought to be supported by all kinds of national property. When tithes were first given by landowners, and afterwards imposed as a charge by Popes and Synods, land was practically the only property in the country. That had long ceased to be the case. Other sources of wealth had sprung up; men possessed great wealth from these sources who contributed nothing to the Church, and the land, reduced in comparative value, still bore the whole burden. Why should that be so? There was but one answer—namely, that public opinion would not allow that act of justice to be done which would place the support of the National Church upon the general national taxation. No Minister would venture to propose it, because the Representatives of the people would not entertain the proposition, and therefore it must be considered as beyond the range of practical politics. But because that was so, it was not necessary to trifle with the subject by means of a Bill which gave no relief to those who were suffering. In the present depressed state of the agriculturists, this Bill, which only sought to perpetuate the present system and to stereotype an injustice, would not be received with any gratitude. Such a Bill might, indeed, be accepted by their Lordships on the powerful recommendation of the noble Marquess; it might even be accepted by the other House of Parliament, because, for other reasons, all sensible men, there and elsewhere, desired to keep the noble Marquess in power; but it was a Bill which, with whatever good intentions it might have been conceived, would neither settle the question, strengthen the Government, nor satisfy the country. He (Lord Brabourne) would not take upon himself the responsibility of moving the rejection of this Bill; but if such a Motion should be made he would feel bound to support it.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): In moving the second reading of this Bill without making any observations, I was actuated by the desire to spare your Lordships an unnecessary speech, as I had already spoken on the question upon the first reading, and I think I followed the rule upon such matters. As regards the speech of my noble Friend, (Lord Brabourne) his remarks were more properly applicable to the second reading, and I regret that the well-known diffidence of the noble Lord prevented him making his speech then. I did not know precisely to what points I ought to address myself in the speech of the noble Lord, because he took a very wide range. I understood in the earlier part of his speech he was contending that tithe ought to be divided into four parts, of which only one part should go to the clergy, and that we ought to do that on the strength of an observation made by Pope Gregory the Great at the end of the sixth century. If the opposite doctrine has been accepted during the centuries that have since elapsed, I think that is as good a title, based on prescription, as the clergy could wish to have. The noble Lord spoke of the enormous advantage which the Church had derived in 1836 from getting a Parliamentary title. I am not quite sure that I appreciate the advantages of a Parliamentary title, after the experience of recent years. I am inclined to define a Parliamentary title as a title which Parliament thinks itself entitled to upset; at all events a prescription of 1,000 years seems to be superior to a Parliamentary title. But then a change seemed to come over the noble Lord's opinions in the course of his speech, and he makes a proposition which would make the hair of the Chancellor of the Exchequer stand on end—namely, that the payment of the clergy should be put on the general taxation of the country. Neither of these two propositions appears to me to be sufficiently within the range of practical politics. Perhaps, however, the best thing I can do in answer to the speech of the noble Lord is to re-state, in a very few words, what the object of the Bill is. That object is to relieve both the titheowner and the farmer from grievances under which they at present suffer—the titheowner that he has to recover a tithe from the person who does not owe it, and the farmer from the grievance that though he does not really owe it he is called upon to pay it. I am aware that the farmer is put into that position by his own act—by an agreement made with his landlord—but the inconvenience of the process is unquestionably very great, because all variations in the amount of tithe fall upon the farmer and are felt by him in bad times, causing much exasperation, owing to the farmer having to bear the brunt of the payment at a time when he can least afford it, and leaving him subject, if he does not pay it, to a process—that of distraint—which we know from experience is singularly calculated to excite popular feeling. The agitation is going on in Wales and in some of the western and southern counties of England at this time. I could easily produce most effective, striking, and I might almost say heartrending appeals from the clergy in those parts of the country, asking Parliament to come to their succour by providing some mode of recovering the tithe that is due other than that of levying by distraint, as the state of popular feeling makes that remedy almost absolutely useless, involves great expenditure, and leaves a bitterness of feeling behind that it is difficult for them to overcome. There is a great political danger in the present state of things. It is not merely that the clergy cannot obtain what is their due, and that a burden is placed on the farmer which appears to him to be a hardship, but ill-feeling is thus being gradually fomented against one of the institutions of this country which may cause great embarrassment in the future. It is to put an end to this state of things that the present Bill is introduced, and I do not believe that any injustice will be caused by this Bill. There can be no doubt that it is the land and the land only that is liable for the tithe. The occupier never has been, and is not now, by law liable. What is liable is the gross produce of the land. If land yields no produce, then there is no tithe due. That has been the case hitherto, and that will still be the case under this Bill. Though the Bill makes the landowner liable for the tithe, it really only provides a change of procedure, substituting the simpler procedure of the County Court in the place of the ancient and exasperating procedure of distraint. The noble Lord raised again the question whether there ought not to be a change in the bargain made in 1836 on account of the changed circumstances since that time. I waited for him to state his case, and I expected that he would produce figures to show that tithe in those days was less valuable than it has become since, and to show the difference between tithe levied under the old law and under the present law. But he did nothing of the kind. I do not think that this can be shown. I still believe that, if you look at the prices of produce as it is now, and the prices in 1836 you will find that prices are still higher than they were at that time. The price of grain has, no doubt, fallen, but the other produce of the land is more valuable than it was in 1836, and therefore the settlement of 1836 is more advantageous to the landowner than if he remained under the old law. The noble Lord did not make out the shadow of a case for reopening the question of valuation and tearing up the bargain which Parliament made in 1836. I do not think that this suggestion of the noble Lord has any support in this House, and I shall not, therefore, detain your Lordships any longer on this point. I acknowledge that the Bill only touches the fringe of a very large subject, and that it touches only that part of the subject with which we can hope most successfully to deal with; but I deny that, because the area the remedy covers is small, therefore the remedy ought not to be applied, or that, because certain great difficulties are beyond our powers, we should not address ourselves, where we can, to solve those smaller difficulties which are within our reach.

Motion agreed to : House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1 (Short title).

On the Motion of The Duke of MARLBOROUGH, Amendment made, in page 1, line 23, to leave out (" personally ").

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, Amendment made, in page 1, line 5, to leave out (" recovery ").

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Personal liability of owner of lands for tithe rent-charge).

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, Amendment made, in page 1, line 17, to leave out (" occupier of the land ") and insert (" lands liable to the payment thereof ").

Amendment moved, in page 1, lines 19 to 24, leave out Sub-section 2.—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in opposing the Amendment, said, that the Bill gave no new right to the titheowner, whose only remedy, up to the present time, had been that of distraint. There could not be a greater mistake than to assume that England was parcelled out among large landowners. Although he would be glad to see a larger number of owners, there were still many owners who were not large landowners, and it was really those owners, as well as the titheowners and the agriculturists, who were suffering most from agricultural depression. They were men of influence in their various districts, and still formed a yeoman class. These men would regret the withdrawal of this concession as a great grievance, and the withdrawal of it would be likely to prevent the passing of the Bill, or to interfere with the working of it. He believed that the concession embodied in the sub-section was only a just and wise concession to make.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON, in supporting the Amendment, said, it was not a one-sided bargain, because account ought to be taken of the 2nd sub-section of Clause 3—which limits arrears recoverable to the profit of the land. That would considerably diminish the claims of the titheowner. Hitherto, his claim had stood first, replacement of farmers' capital second, the profit of the farmer third, and the rent of the landlord fourth. But the 2nd sub-section of Clause 3 put the tithe rent-charge after the replacement of capital and after the profit of the farmer, and made it only precede the actual rent. At present, the claim of the titheowner was a perfectly clear one; but, under the Bill, it would be a question for the Court to decide. There was no doubt there would be a number of losses under the 2nd sub-section of the 3rd clause.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE, who had also given Notice of his intention to move the omission of this sub-section, supported the Amendment.

LORD BRAMWELL also supported the Amendment on the ground that the titheowner would lose 5 per cent, for which he received no benefit in return, and the landowner would get 5 per cent for no reason whatever.

LORD BRABOURNE said, he hoped his noble Friend at the head of the Government would consent to modify, instead of striking out, the sub-section which gave the 5 per cent reduction for prompt payment. Their Lordships could now show that they desired to benefit, not themselves, but that class of small owners upon whom the depression of the times weighed so heavily. He would propose that the section should be amended, so that relief should be given not to all owners, but to owners of less than 50 or 100 acres of land, who would fairly represent the class with which they all sympathized, and whom they could thus, to some small extent, relieve.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that many clergy collected their own tithes, and many tithes were collected at small costs, and upon the whole, it would be better to omit the words.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Recovery of tithe rent-charge from the owner).

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, the following Amendments made:—In page 1, line 27, leave out ("may be sued for such arrears"); in line 28, leave out ("for"); in line 30, leave out ("so sued"), and insert ("sued by virtue of this Act"); and in page 2, line 25, after ("judgment") insert ("for such arrears or sum").

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, the following Amendment made:—In page 1, line 27, after ("payable"), insert—("Such arrears together with the full costs of recovering the same shall be recoverable from").

On the Motion of The Earl of SELBORNE, the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 7, after ("land"), add—

("When the owner so sued is not himself the occupier of the lands, the rent received or receivable by such owner in respect thereof shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to be the profit of the land").

On the Motion of The Earl of SELBORNE, the following Amendment made:—In Sub-section 5, page 2, line 39, after ("therein") add—

("When the owner of any land in his own occupation has been assessed to the poor's rate in respect thereof on a valuation exceeding the amount of the tithe rentcharge for any such period of twelve months, the tithe rentcharge shall not be deemed to exceed the profit of the lands during such period").

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in reference to the subject under notice, said, he wished to point out that the section which gave the Court power to make orders against the landowner, did not provide for the case of farms being thrown upon the landowner in a bad state of cultivation, and which required a large outlay to bring them into a good state, but before that was done, had produced no return. During the past few years it had happened to him to have, from time to time, farms put on his hands in a state of inferior cultivation. By a sufficient outlay those farms had been brought into a good state of cultivation, but while they had been in the hands of the landowner no profit had been received. As he understood this sub-section, it appeared to him that the owner who cultivated his own land in these circumstances would be exonerated from the payment of tithe rent-charge. He did not think this was fair, and he trusted words would be inserted to guard against the application of the sub-section as he stated it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, his noble Friend must remember that under the old Law of Tithe, if there was no produce there was no tithe; and under the law as it existed, if there was not sufficient distraint, there was no tithe, unless the person interested took the land into his own hands. Their Lordships might assume that, as regarded cultivation, most persons would act on the ordinary principles of profit and loss; but if the cultivation produced no profit the payment of tithe would cease.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 20, after ("trust") add ("it shall in every such case be incumbent upon the owner to specify, to the satisfaction of the court, the property held upon such trust, and the court shall have power thereupon to order execution to issue against such property, by all or any such ways and means as would have been proper if the same had belonged to the owner for his own benefit").—(The Earl of Selborne.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that he had no objection to accept the words.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment moved,

In line 30, at end of line insert as a separate sub-section:—"Arrears of tithe rentcharge may be recovered in the county court for the district in which the lands charged with such tithe rentcharge or any part of such lands are or is situate, and may, whatever the amount of such arrears, be recoverable with full costs, and where it is shown to the county court that by reason either of the absence of the owner of such lands or of the difficulty of ascertaining the person who is the owner thereof, there is likely to be delay in the payment of any sum adjudged to be paid for such arrears, the court may, in adjudging payment of the arrears or any sum in respect thereof, order that in the event of the non-payment of such arrears or sum within the time limited by the judgment, the person in that behalf named in the judgment shall be receiver and manager of the lands charged with such tithe rentcharge, and upon the expiration of the said time, without payment having been made, the person so named shall, without any further order of the court, become a manager and receiver of the said lands as if he had at the date of such expiration been appointed by the court."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

LORD BRAMWELL said, he thought it important to distinguish who was the owner, and he would suggest that some obligation should be put upon the occupier upon request to say who was owner. The Bill in some cases, he thought, seemed to contemplate that there would always be an owner and an occupier, not bearing in mind that a person might be both owner and occupier in some instances.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD HERSCHELL said, cases might arise in which a man might let his son or some other person into occupation of land without paying rents, or where in consideration of a lump sum a small rent was taken. In these cases, there would be no profit, in the first instance, because there was no rent; and, in the second, a smaller profit than was really due by reason of the reduced rent. These were matters which would require consideration before Report.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that there would be a beneficial occupation; but the question would receive consideration.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE moved an Amendment, to the effect that, when the owner of any land in his own occupation was assessed to the poor rate on a valuation exceeding the tithe rent-charge, the tithe rent-charge should not be deemed to exceed the profit of the lands.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that what the Amendment meant was, that after an owner of land had exercised all due diligence to let his land and had been unsuccessful, thereupon becoming the occupier himself, the Poor Law valuation was to be taken as the net profit of the land. He objected to that, because it was contrary to the whole principle of the Bill, which was that the owner was to be liable for what he had actually received. A great deal of land was not even cultivated; but he knew of no case in which the Poor Law valuation regarded land as worth nothing.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that it was not from what the land was estimated to bear from year to year that the assessment was determined, but from the value taken over a long average of time. The practice proposed by the Amendment would, therefore, have a disturbing effect.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 39, after Sub-section 5, add following paragraph:—"If the owner of the lands liable to tithe rentcharge shall also be the occupier thereof, the wages of labour and all other expenses of cultivation, including interest at five pounds per centum upon the capital invested in the stock, implements, and similar things, shall be charged against the lands for each twelve months before any rent or profit is deemed to accrue from the said lands."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

Amendment negatived.

Amendment moved, after Clause 3, add new Clause (A.):

"(1.) It shall be lawful for the judge of any county court having jurisdiction in the place where any lands on which tithe rentcharge is charged are situate, although no action for the recovery thereof may be then depending, upon affidavit made by the person to whom such tithe rentcharge is due, or by any person on his behalf who can swear positively to the facts, stating that the tithe rentcharge charged upon such lands, or any part thereof, has been due, and in arrear for not less than three months after the same has become payable, and still remains unsatisfied, and verifying the amount so due and unsatisfied, and that any person other than the owner is in occupation of such lands, as a tenant holding to the best of the deponent's belief under such owner, and liable to pay rent to him in respect of such occupation, to order that any rent then due from such occupying tenant to such owner, or thereafter to become due from him to such owner until all such tithe rentcharge so in arrears shall be fully paid and satisfied, shall be attached to answer and pay the tithe rentcharge so in arrear; and by the same or any subsequent order, it may be ordered that such occupying tenant shall appear before the court as the judge thereof may appoint, to show cause why he should not pay to the person to whom such tithe rentcharge is due the rent then due, or thereafter to become due from him to such owner, or so much thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy the amount of the rent-charge so due and in arrear as aforesaid.

"(2.) Service of an order whereby the rent so due or to become due as aforesaid to the owner of such lands shall be attached, or notice thereof given to such occupying tenant in such manner as the court shall direct, shall bind all the rent so due, and which shall thenceforth, until the rentcharge so in arrear shall be fully paid and satisfied, accrue or become due in the hands of such occupying tenant.

"(3.) If, out of the rent so due, or which shall have so accrued and become due as aforesaid, the occupying tenant, on whom such order for attachment of rent shall have been served, or to whom notice thereof shall have been given in manner aforesaid, shall not, on demand duly made by the person entitled to such tithe rentcharge, pay the same, or so much thereof as such rent as aforesaid shall extend to satisfy, the person entitled to such tithe rentcharge shall be at liberty to proceed against such occupying tenant by writ, to be issued on an ex parte application out of the said court, calling upon him to show cause why there should not be execution against him for the amount of the tithe rentcharge so in arrear, or for the amount of the rent then due from him to the owner as aforesaid, if less than the amount of the tithe rentcharge so in arrear, and also for costs; and, unless such cause shall be shown to the satisfaction of the judge, the court shall thereupon order execution to issue in a summary way, in the same manner as if judgment for such amount had been recovered in an action duly brought in such court.

"(4.) Payment by, or execution levied upon, an occupying tenant under any such attachment or proceeding as aforesaid, shall be a valid discharge to him, as against such owner as aforesaid, to the amount of the rent so paid or levied.

"(5.) In any proceeding taken in any court under this section notice of such proceeding shall be given to the owner, or left at his last usual place of residence (if known), at such time and in such manner as the court shall direct, unless there shall be any difficulty in ascertaining or discovering such owner, or in giving such notice, in which case the court shall have power to dispense with the same.

"(6.) The costs of any application for an attachment of rent under this Act, and of any proceedings consequent thereon, shall be in the discretion of the court."—(The Earl of Selborne.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY opposed the insertion of the proposed clause.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Halsbury) said, he thought it ought to be inserted, so that a fuller opinion might be taken as regarded it.

LORD MONK BRETTON said, that if the new clause was inserted, much of the good which was anticipated from the Bill would be undone. Under the Irish Tithe Act a Receiver was appointed.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that he would accept the clause. On the whole, it perhaps would be better to take the opinion of the House of Commons upon it.

New Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clauses 4, 5, and 6 separately agreed to.

Clause 7 (Facilities for discharge of land from tithe rent-charge).

Amendments made.

On the Motion of The Earl of SELBORNE, the following Amendment made:—In page 4, line 10, to leave out ("equal to") and insert ("not being less than.")

Amendment moved, in page 4, lines 16 to 36, to leave out Sub-section 3.—(The Lord Bishop of London.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, in supporting the Amendment, said, he wished to point out that the plan proposed in that sub-section as to endowment trustees would be attended with great expense, with constant change as to the trustees, and also with great risks as to the securities.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he would accept the Amendment, reserving to himself the power of suggesting alterations at a future stage.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion of The Lord Bishop of LONDON, the following Amendments made:—In page 4, line 38, after ("sole") insert ("or aggregate, or to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England"); in lines 40 to 43, leave out ("invested by them") to the end of Sub-section 4, and insert—

("Carried by them to the redeemed tithe fund herein-after mentioned, and invested together with that fund, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners shall pay out of that fund to the person who would otherwise have been entitled to receive the tithe rentcharge redeemed such annual sum as at the time of the redemption the Commissioners may determine to be the net annual sum available for such person out of the redemption money"); and in page 5, line 2, leave out ("parson or").

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 (Supplemental provision as to endowment trustees).

On the Motion of The Lord Bishop of LONDON, Clause struck out of the Bill.

On the Motion of The LORD BISHOP of LONDON, the following new Clauses agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause 8—

(Provision for redemption of tithe rentcharge).

"(1.) Any person desirous of discharging his lands from liability to tithe rentcharge payable to any ecclesiastical corporation, or to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England (in this Act referred to as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners) may redeem the said tithe rentcharge by the payment of an annuity of such amount and for such term of years as may be agreed upon with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

"(2.) The annuity shall be payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and shall be carried by them to a separate fund, in this Act referred to as the redeemed tithe fund.

"(3.) There shall be payable in perpetuity out of the redeemed tithe fund to the person who would otherwise have been entitled to receive the tithe rentcharge, such annual sum as is determined in manner hereinafter mentioned to represent the net income derived from the tithe rentcharge.

"(4.) The Ecclesiastical Commissioners shall pay out of the redeemed tithe fund all sums properly incurred by them in or incidental to the execution of this section, and subject thereto shall invest the same in any securities in which they can by law invest their common fund, and the dividends and income arising from such securities shall be carried to the redeemed tithe fund and applied in like manner as directed by this Act with respect to that fund.

"(5.) A person desirous of discharging his lands from any tithe rentcharge by an annuity under this section shall apply to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and those Commissioners shall thereupon name the annual amount which they consider ought to represent the net income derived from that tithe rentcharge, and the amount and duration of the annuity by which the same is to be redeemed, and shall send, if the tithe rentcharge is payable to the parson of a benefice having the cure of souls, to the incumbent and the patron of the benefice, and if the tithe rentcharge is payable to any other ecclesiastical corporation, to that corporation, notice of the annual amount which they consider ought to represent the net income derived from the tithe rentcharge, and before finally determining such annual amount and agreeing with the applicant on the annuity, shall consider and have due regard to any objections to such amount which may be sent to them within one month after such notice.

"(6.) When the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have agreed with the applicant upon an annuity under this section, they shall certify the same to the Land Commissioners, and thereupon the Land Commissioners shall issue a certificate discharging the lands from liability to the tithe rentcharge redeemed by the annuity, and charging the lands with the annuity, and thereupon the annuity shall during the specified period be a rentcharge issuing out of the said lands, and be charged thereon in priority to all other charges and incumbrances whatsoever, except land tax, Crown rents, chief rents, and quit rents, and be recoverable in like manner as any other rentcharge is recoverable by law, and shall not be liable to any poor or other local rate or to land tax.

"(7.) The owner of any lands charged with the payment of an annuity under this section may at any time determine such annuity by payment of a capital sum of such amount as may be agreed upon with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Upon payment of the said capital sum, the determination of the annuity shall be certified by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to the Land Commissioners, and thereupon the Land Commissioners shall issue a certificate of such determination, and the certificate shall discharge the lands from liability for the annuity.

"(8.) The said capital sum shall be carried to the redeemed tithe fund, and be applied in like manner as directed by this Act with respect to that fund.

"(9.) Any tenant for life or person having the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882, also any person having power under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to sell land by agreement in pursuance of that Act shall have power to agree with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the redemption of tithe rentcharge under this Act, and any money which may by law be applied in the redemption of tithe rentcharge charged on any lands may be applied in payment of a capital sum for the determination of an annuity charged under this Act on such lands."

New Clause, to follow new Clause 8—
(Compulsory redemption of small sums of tithe rentcharge.)

"(1.) Where the total amount of tithe rentcharge which is payable to an ecclesiastical corporation or to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and is charged on the lands of the same owner, does not exceed two pounds, the person for the time being entitled to the tithe rentcharge may by notice in writing require such owner to redeem the same by payment to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners either of a capital sum equal to twenty-one times the amount of tithe rentcharge fixed by the apportionment or any altered apportionment, or of an annuity of fifty-two years calculated at the rate of one pound sixteen shillings for every two pounds of tithe rentcharge fixed by the apportionment or any altered apportionment.

"(2.) If within six months after such notice has been served on the owner, the said capital sum has not been paid, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners may certify the amount of the annuity to the Land Commissioners, and shall satisfy the Land Commissioners that the said notice had been duly served, and if the Land Commissioners are so satisfied, the provisions of this Act shall apply as if such annuity had been agreed upon between the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the owner of the land.

"(3.) A notice for the purposes of this section shall be served on the owner by serving the same either on him or on the person actually receiving the tithe rentcharge whether as agent or otherwise, and by so serving the same either on such owner or person personally, or by leaving the same at his most usual or last known place of abode in England. Such notice may also be served by post, and it shall be sufficient in proving such service to prove that the notice was prepaid and properly addressed and put into the post office, and the same shall be deemed to be properly addressed if addressed to such owner or person at his most usual or last known place of abode in England.

"(4.) The sums received by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners under this section shall be carried to the redeemed tithe fund, and applied in like manner as directed by this Act with respect to that fund, and the Commissioners shall pay in perpetuity out of that fund to the person who would otherwise be entitled to receive the tithe rentcharge redeemed under this section such annual sum as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners may at the time of the redemption determine to be equivalent for the purposes of such redemption to the net income derived from the tithe rentcharge."

Clause 9 (Savings) verbally amended, and, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10 (Meaning of owner, and liabilities of several owners and mode of service of writ on owner).

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, the following Amendments made:—

In page 6, line 31, leave out the first ("or"), and insert ("means the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods, and in case of lands belonging to"); in line 32, leave out ("Commissioners and"); in line 33, after ("1836") insert ("so however that the provisions of this Act with respect to persons holding lands in trust for a public purpose shall apply to such Commissioners and officers, and any sums recovered from the Commissioners of Woods under this Act shall be deemed to be part of the expenses of the management of the land revenues of the Crown, and shall be payable out of such money and in such manner as those expenses are by law payable"); and in line 33, at end of foregoing paragraph ("Any reference in this Act to a person entitled to tithe rentcharge shall, in the case of tithe rentcharge belonging to the Queen in right of her Crown, mean the Commissioners of Woods, and in the case of tithe rentcharge belonging to the Duchy of Lancaster, or to the Duchy of Cornwall, mean the officers mentioned in section thirteen of the 'Tithe Commutation Act, 1836'").

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

On the Motion of The Earl of SELBORNE, the following new Clauses agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill:—

New Clause (B).—

"Nothing in this Act shall alter or affect the order or priority of any tithe rentcharge, as a charge upon any land, as between the person entitled thereto and any persons entitled to other charges upon the same land."

New Clause (C).—

"(1.) The purchase money of land sold by a university or college under the Universities and College Estates Act, 1858, or any other Act amending the same, may, with the consent of the Land Commissioners, be applied by the university or college in the discharge of any lands belonging thereto from liability to tithe rentcharge in manner provided by this Act.

"(2.) The consent of the Land Commissioners shall be evidenced by an order under their hands and common seal in the form or to the effect set forth in the third schedule to this Act."

Clause 11 (Definitions).

On the Motion of The Marquess of SALISBURY, the following Amendment made:—In page 7, after line 29, insert as a separate paragraph ("The expression 'parson' means rector, vicar, or other incumbent").

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

MEMORANDUM AS TO NEW CLAUSES PROPOSED BY THE BISHOP OF LONDON.

"The new clauses have been prepared with the view of providing facilities for the redemption of tithe rentcharge without any advance of capital, and upon terms as easy as possible to the landowner.

"It is proposed to effect the redemption by converting the permanent payment varying with the 'averages' into a fixed payment by way of terminable annuity, including principal and interest, for a limited number of years.

"In order to make the annual payment as small as possible, it is proposed to extend the payment over a term of fifty-two years, and to reduce the rate of interest below the rates usually charged by the Public Works Loan Commissioners for advances made by them.

"The rate of interest proposed to be charged in computing the terminable annuity is three and five-eighths per cent., about one half per cent. less than the rate which is usually charged by the insurance offices for advances repayable by instalments over a term of fifty years.

"The extinction of a tithe rentcharge of the 'commuted value' of one hundred pounds per annum could be secured upon these terms by a fixed annual payment of ninety pounds for a period of fifty-two years.

"The landowner would pay for a limited number of years a fixed payment ten per cent. below the commuted amount, and should he at any time during the term be desirous of discharging his land from the payment, he could do so by paying, without notice, the balance of capital remaining unpaid at the end of any half year of the term.

"The above terms are not, except as respects tithe rentcharge under two pounds, stated in the new clauses, as some variation in the terms must necessarily be required to meet exceptional cases.

"The payments, whether of capital or by way of annuity, would be made to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and carried by them to a separate fund to be called the 'Redeemed Tithe Fund.' Out of this fund payments would be made half-yearly by the Commissioners to the owner of the tithe redeemed or in course of redemption. The payment to the tithe-owner in respect of each one hundred pounds of 'com-mutated amount' of tithe rentcharge would be seventy pounds, free of all deductions excepting income tax. This would be the exact equivalent of a sale at twenty years purchase, the money being paid down and invested in a three and a half per cent. stock at par.

"These payments would be charged upon the 'Redeemed Tithe Fund,' and the proportions of the annuities which would provide the required capital by the end of the term would be invested half yearly as they were paid.

"The clauses relating to the compulsory redemption of amounts under two pounds have been prepared upon the same terms, and would ensure the extinction of these small payments without inflicting any hardship upon the small freeholders, as they would only have to pay a fixed payment for a definite number of years equal to nine-tenths of the 'commuted amount.' And in the event of their being in a position to discharge the outstanding balance of the purchase money, it could be paid off at the end of any half year without notice.

"20th May 1887."

SCHEDULES.

Second Schedules severally agreed to.

On the Motion of the LORD BISHOP of LONDON, the following new Schedule agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill :—

THIRD SCHEDULE.

Form of Order authorising the application of Purchase Money in the Discharge of Lands from Liability to Tithe Rentcharge.

LAND COMMISSION.

In the matter of the Universities and College Estates Acts, 1858 to 1880, and in the matter of the Tithe Rentcharge (Recovery) Act, 1887, ex parte [here state title of university or college].

Whereas there is now standing in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to the credit of the account of the Land Commissioners, ex parte [here state the particular amount] the sum of £ [here insert the amount of cash or stock] being moneys derived from the sale of certain lands belonging to the said university [or college] by virtue of certain orders heretofore issued by the said Commissioners under the provisions of the said Acts.

And whereas a statement has been submitted to the said Commissioners on behalf of the said university [or college] containing a proposal for the application of the said sum of £ [or the sum of £ part of the said sum of £] to [here name the purpose to which it is proposed to apply the money] the said application being one within the provisions of the said Acts.

Now the said Commissioners being of the opinion upon consideration of the circumstances that the proposed application of the said money will be advantageous and for the interests of the said university [or college] and their successors, do hereby direct that the said sum of £ [or the said sum of £ to be paid or raised out of the said sum of £] now standing to the credit of the said account, be applied to the purpose aforesaid.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—AFFAIRS OF SWAZILAND.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON, in rising to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government have decided upon the course to be adopted with respect to Swaziland, and what communications have been addressed to or received from the President of the South African Republic on the question? said, he would remind their Lordships that a continual incursion of Boers into Swaziland was going on, and if no steps were taken very soon, it would be extremely difficult to get them out at all. British rights were largely involved in this question; almost all the mining rights in the country being in the hands of British subjects, and not only our own fellow-countrymen, but the Natives especially needed protection against a large incursion of Boers. He hoped to hear a satisfactory assurance with respect to Pondoland, similar to that which was made the other day in "another place" by the Secretary of State for the Colonies with regard to Zululand.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of ONSLOW) said, that Her Majesty's Government had ascertained that the Swazi King had made complaints to the Transvaal Government of the action of English subjects, precisely similar to those made to the Governor of Natal with regard to the Boers. The fact appeared to be that the King had granted grazing licences to the Boers, and had also granted mining licences of the same ground. The time of year had now come when the Boers would take advantage of these grazing concessions, and would drive in their cattle, and that was the probable reason of these rumours of Boer raids. The Government of the South African Republic had stated their belief that these rumours were unfounded, and had telegraphed that they knew full well the obligations which the London Convention of 1884 imposed upon both parties, that they had always kept those obligations in view, and would continue to do so. Her Majesty's Government were informed that the Transvaal Government had sent a Commission to investigate the position of affairs, and Her Majesty's Government had requested to be furnished with a copy of their Report. Looking at the friendly feeling of the Representatives of the Transvaal Government, and the desire which they had expressed to give effect to the provisions of the Convention of London, Her Majesty's Government had addressed a despatch to Sir Hercules Robinson, inviting him to consider whether some joint action might not be possible between Her Majesty's Government and the Transvaal Government for the maintenance of order in Swaziland.

QUESTIONS.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES—THE ANGLO-AMERICAN FISHERIES DISPUTES.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has yet received a reply from the American Government to the Marquess of Salisbury's Despatch of the 24th March, and which contained proposals for a settlement of the Anglo-American Fisheries disputes; if so, will he be good enough to favour the House with a synopsis of the answer; and, what measures (pending existing negotiations) Her Majesty's Government, in conjunction with that of Canada, intend adopting for the purpose of preventing further friction and ill feeling between the two Governments, by the seizure of American ships, during the approaching fishery season?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.): No reply has yet been received to the Marquess of Salisbury's

Despatch of the 24th of March. The measures to be taken during the ensuing fishing season for the protection of the inshores will be similar to those taken last year, which were warranted under the terms of existing Treaty arrangements between Great Britain and the United States. Her Majesty's Government entertain no doubt that the Canadian Government will use all possible moderation compatible with the protection of the public interests; and they also hope that vessels from the United States will give no occasion for interference with them.

METROPOLIS—THE ROYAL PARKS—CONSTITUTION HILL.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.) asked the First Commissioner of Works, Why the public are debarred from the use and enjoyment of Constitution Hill, which is maintained and inspected at the public cost, out of moneys appropriated to the Royal Parks; who are the persons privileged to ride and drive along it; and, whether he will endeavour to open it for the convenience of the Metropolis?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER (Mr. PLUNKET) (Dublin University): The use of Constitution Hill by the public is subject, as in the case of all the other roads in the Royal Parks, to Rules laid down in pursuance of the Parks Regulation Act, 1872. At present, all foot passengers and persons riding on horseback can pass up Constitution Hill; but special permission is required by persons using carriages. I am not aware that it is intended to make any change in these arrangements.

MR. LAWSON inquired by whom permission was given?

MR. PLUNKET: Through the Home Office.

ADMIRALTY—PERMANENT FINANCIAL CONTROL.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Government have it in contemplation to establish at the Admiralty a permanent financial Control, similar to that which it is officially stated will be introduced at the War Office?

THE FIRST LORD (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON) (Middlesex, Ealing): The

hon. Baronet has put this Question under a misapprehension. The Secretary of State for War stated the other day that, inasmuch as a certain portion of the expenditure of the Ordnance Department was exempted from the financial control to which all other expenditure at the War Office was subject, he proposed hereafter to establish a stricter control over this branch of outlay. No branch of expenditure at the Admiralty is in this condition, all being equally subject to the same financial control and check.

ARMY (INDIA)—INDIAN ARTILLERY—THE 9-POUNDER MUZZLE-LOADING GUN.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that, notwithstanding the Government of India admit the inferiority of the present 9-pounder muzzle-loading gun, with which the Indian Artillery is equipped, to the Ordnance it would have to meet in action, and have recommended the new 12-pounder breech-loading gun should be substituted for it, only 10 batteries of 60 guns out of the entire 417 are to be provided for before the 1st April, 1888; what time it will take to provide the armament for the whole of the batteries in India; and, what is the reason why the three batteries which were to have been supplied by the 31st March last have not yet been sent out to India?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR JAMES FERGUSSON) (Manchester, N.E.) (who replied) said: The answer to the first Question is in the affirmative. The time within which the new armament for the whole of the batteries in India will be provided depends upon financial and other considerations. The three batteries will be shortly despatched. The reason why they were not sent earlier is that the War Department could not get them ready in the time that has elapsed since the receipt of the demand.

POOR LAW (METROPOLIS)—STRAND BOARD OF GUARDIANS—CASE OF ELIZABETH SMITH.

SIR HENRY TYLER (Great Yarmouth) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the case referred to in the following extract from The Globe of the 12th instant (which has been verified as accurate by the Superintendent of the Strand Union Schools at Edmonton); and whether he will consider of the advisability of giving the Guardians some limited discretionary power in dealing with such a case, which is by no means an isolated one, or take other steps to protect children in similar cases:—

"Yesterday, at the Strand Board of Guardians, a woman named Elizabeth Smith, who was wretchedly attired, applied for the custody of her two children, aged respectively 12 and 14, who were in the schools at Edmonton. The Clerk read a Report, which had been made by one of the officers of the Union, to the effect that he had visited Mrs. Smith's home, and found she had only one room, in a wretched condition, almost devoid of furniture, and with a very little bedding, and in this room slept with the mother a daughter aged 19, and a son aged 16 years. The Chairman strongly advised the applicant not to take her two boys from the schools to her miserable home. One of them was in the band, and would become a good musician, while the other was making good progress with his trade as a shoemaker, and both were very happy. Mr. Bennett said it would be a shame to give these children up to Mrs. Smith, who spent her time going from public house to public house.—The Relieving Officer said that Mrs. Smith's husband poisoned himself some time ago owing to the conduct of his wife.—The Chairman: I implore and entreat of you, Mrs. Smith, not to take these children away.—Mrs. Smith: Can't I have my children if I want them?—The Chairman: I must tell you if you insist upon it you can have them.—Mrs. Smith: I do insist upon it, and I will have them.—The Chairman: Very well, if you say so you must have them, and we cannot help it?"
